

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

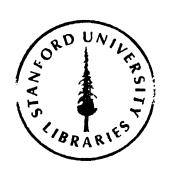

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Panis, Dec. 9 .- The Duke Decres, whose valet attempted to assassinate him by exploding packets of gun-powder between his mattresses while he slept, died on Friday, probably of the burns he received on that oc-

The Tribunal of First Instance, at Gex, has condefined the editor of The Drapeau Blane to three months imprisonment, a fine of 200 f. and 6000 f. expenses, for a libel on Count Chastel, in designating him as the head of the conspiracy in the East.

The King has authorised the Consitury of the Reformed Church of Bordeaux to accept a legacy of 50,000 fr. left to it by a Madame Streikeisen.

The Diet of Wirtemberg assembled on the first inst.
when the Chamber of Deputies woted an Address of Thanks to their sovereign, for the present which he had made them of a gold medal struck upon the occasion of his concluding the Constitutional Compact.
The advices from Vienna are of the 28th November.

They have again assumed a warlike complexion. Count Bellegarde goes to Italy, with full powers to direct the military operations, so as to supprecede the necessity of constant reference to the Government at Vienna, by the General commanding in the field. Field Marshals Kienmayer and Wimpfen had received orders to join the army in Italy. An important mission is said to have been confided to Field-Marshal Buhns, the military commandant in Lombardy. The Ministers at Troppau, at the termination of the conferences there, relative to the general affairs of Europe, were to repair to Vienna, to await the decision of the court of Naples with regard to the propositions which had been submitted to it. I for Londou.

A letter from Lisbon, dated Dec. 3, says, " In England you do not seem to be aware that we are here completely at the mercy, and under the controul, of a garrison of 14,000 men. Governors we have, it is true, whose names sanction the usual routine business of the capital (I can't say of the country); but when any measure, in the least beyond this, is to be carried, if any violent or arbitrary proceeding is to be resorted to, in order to further the cause of liberty, a military council is held, composed of all officers commanding corps; the subject is discussed by them, and if approved of, they furnish the ready means of putting it into execution—a squadron of dra-goons, or a company of bayonets. A tribunal of this sort it was which decreed the deposition and hanishment of the late Vice-President of the Government, Silveira; the nature of whose offence has not yet been communi-cated to the public. Friere, the President, has already discovered the march of regeneration to differ so widely in its theory and its practice, that he expresses bitter re-pentance for having identified himself with the revolu-tion. He has withdrawn himself from public affairs, leaving those who have less foresight, and more ambi-tion, to the vain endeavour of directing the powerful tion, to the vain endeavour of directing the powerful engine which their ignorance has set in motion, and which, ere long, will crush those whose folly has entangled them amongst its complicated machinery."

MADRID, Nov. 30.—In answer to your queries about the Cortes, I send the following particulars, which have the merit of being correct, if they are not interesting. This assemblage is composed of about 184 members. Among them are three Bishops and thirty Priests, the latter not officiating in their clerical capacity, but elected with the others as ordinary members; the remainder is composed of the psinoipal merchants, military o.incers, farmers, and lawyers. Their sittings are in general from ten in the morning till three in the afternoon, and, as occasion may require, they also assemble during the evening. ble during the evening.

Their speeches are generally short, and most of the members deliver their opinion on every subject that is discussed, scarcely without an exception, as very few of discussed, scarcely without an exception, as very few of the representatives engross the attention of the house for a great length of time; they usually deliver their opinions in as few words as possible, so that overy member has an opportunity of speaking. Every month a new President or Speaker, is elected out of the body of representatives by ballot; and no person, has, since the commencement of the re-union, acted in the rapacity of President more than once. The person acting in that capacity is not robed, but dressed in the same costume as the members. He also has a bell, which he costume as the members. He also has a bell, which he makes use of to obtain silence, or put an end to any disorder that may occur.

The representatives are chosen by the people of every province, who appoint their deputies, in number about twenty or more, in proportion as the place is exten-sive. These deputies are called electors, and they have the choice of representatives, and all differences in the election are decided by a majority.

For every seventy thousand inhabitants there is one representative, every housekeeper having the right to vote, which right he exercises in choosing the electors. There is a new regulation to be put in force in the year 1821, which will prevent all persons voting who cannot read and write.

The demand for British goods is unprecedented since the prohibitory decree. The British merchants here are disastisfied with the prospect before them; but with the Spaniards, who have amour propre chough to think themselves equal to any undertaking, and already hoast that in less than a year they will eclipse the English in manufactories; the prohibitory decree is very popular. The following is an extract from a letter received by the last arrival from Gibraltar:

"GIBRALVAR, Nov. 24.—The Montague packet, bound from Falmouth to the Brazils, arrived here on the 10th inst. under the protection of the Favourite sloop of war, which fell in with her 300 miles to the westward of Lisbon, in great distress, having sprung a leak, ward of Lisbon, in great distress, having sprung a leak, and in the greatest dauger of sinking. She is now hove down, and undergoing a thorough repair in this bay. The 11th regiment are under orders for embarkation for Plymouth, to be relieved by the 80th regiment, for Plymouth, to be relieved by the 80th regiment, from Cork, which is daily expected. Lord and Lady Strangford and suite re-embarked on board the Cambrian frigate on the 21st inst. after passing a few days in this garrison, in order to proceed on their voyage to Constantinople, where his Lordship is appointed Ambassador. We are happy to state, that, by the last accounts from Tangier, the Morocco states are declared whells from franches are infections and it is wholly free from plague or infection; and it is hoped that the communication between that empire and the garrison of Gibraltar will be shortly opened. rock is very healthy and the weather beautifully mild and serene.

Paris, Dec. 11 .- The Prince Cimitile, Envoy Exraordinary from the Government of Naples to the British Court, who has made a few days stay in Paris, set off yesterday for London.

BRUSSEIS, Dec. 4,—A letter from Vienna announces that Lord Stewart is about to set off from that capital

-It is contidently said that the VIENNA, Dec. 1 .-Chancellor of Prussia, Prince de Haudenburgh, will leave Troppau about the middle of this month for Laybach, the capital of Illyria, whither all the Ministers who compose the Congress will proceed, and continue their deliberations. The King of Naples, it is affirmed, has been invited to a personal interview with the Emperors of Austria and Russia in that city. The Emperor and Prince de Metternich, Minister of Foreign Affairs, are expected in this capital about the 8th inst.—It is rumoured that the military occupation of Naples and Sicily, is finally resolved upon: various regiments cantoned in Bohemia, Moravia, and Gallicia, have received marching orders for Italy .- It continues to be reported that an Austrian Manifesto, respecting Neapolitan affairs, will shortly appear.—The Emperor Alexander is expected to arrive in his capital, from Troppau, in about eight days after our Sovereign. All that the German and the Foreign Journals have said relative to a pretended difference of opinion amongst the assembled Cabinets, and about notes sometimes said to be presented. on the part of Russia, and then on the part of France and England, against the intervention of Foreign Pow-ers in the affairs of Naples, is wholly destitute of authentic foundation. The answer of the King of Naples to the despatch which has been forwarded to him from the Congress, is expected on the 17th or 18th inst.

FATAL EFFECTS OF THE FEVER AT SAVANNAH.

[Exiract of a Lotter.] "1t was not later than about the 20th of July, that the yellow fever began its ravages. For some time the disease was confined within very narrow limits; and its subjects were (almost without exception) either strangers, or persons of irregular habits. Those circumstances tended not a little to allay the fears of the citizens generally; and those who thought proper to leave their homes, were (with some exceptions) content with only removing to a more healthful part of the city. Through the month of August, the disease became gradually extended over a great part of the city; but still was most prevalent in the neighbourhood where it originated; it was becoming, too, more indiscriminate.—Citizens as well as strangers, and persons of the most correct manner of life, as well as the irregular, were occasionally found among its victims. With the increase of disease, and the knowledge of these circumstances of its progress, the alarm of our people increased. Early in September, the unpresing sharpeter of the disease became participal. opposing character of the disease became notorious. It now fully appeared, that no character, nor circumstances, could exemption from the fatal distemper. Old and young, temperate and intemperate, persons in every part of the city; and those who had been all their lives here, as well as non-residents, were in increasing number, among the sick, and remeetis, were in increasing number, among the sick, and the dying, and the dead. No imagination will exceed the alarm that pervaded the city. Panic-struck at the unprecedented calamity we were suffering, and anticipating from the then fearful mortality, the most awful history that was to follow, no one seemed to have a care but to save his life, and the lives of those about him. To face the seat of disease and death, was generally regarded to be the way to escape, and by the 10th or 20th of the month, more than 3-fourths of our entire white population had fled the city. Among then our entire wants population had ned the city. Among them two physicians, one of whom was an old residenter and practitioner here. By, or before the first of October, our city was so described as not to contain a greater (reputed) population than 1000, but notwithstanding this almost total abandonment of the city, the daily number of deaths never decreased:—we buried 230 during the month of September, and of the 1000 who remained, 140 were buried within the first 16 days of October. The disease has not yet disappeared; but within the last five or six days I have not known peared; but within the last five or six days I have not known any new cases.

"Among the dead are seven or eight physicians. Three times, if not oftener; the same hearse has carried the husband and wife together, to be buried. Once, the husband, wife, and child, were all interred together. I have seen the father and his son lying dead together. I called to console an amiable lady who had the day before buried her excellent mother. I found her sitting at the head of her husband's corpse! That husband was Dr. Berreen, an able physician, ar amiable man—the friend of many friends, and an honour to our city.

But: O, amazing goodness! I have walked through the are, and it has not burnt me! Myself, my wife, my children,

"P.S. The sexton has just called, and given me the official return of the number of interments, from the 1st to the 23 d of October, inclusive, i. e. 188. The whole number, from the 1st of August to the 23d of October, 537.

The disease being confined to a small part of the city, was regarded as a proof that it originated in some local cause, which it was hoped would be ascertained and removed.

INDIAN AND COLONIAL.

St. Domingo.—The George Bickerton, of Cork, which arrived at that port on Wednesday se'nnight, in 54 days, from Jamaica, has brought further confirmation of the important intelligence recently received from St. Domingo. On the 21st October, off Cape Tibercon St. Domingo, the fell in with and order the beroon, St. Domingo, she fell in with and spoke the schooner Eliza, of Salem (America) bound to Port-au-Prince, having touched at Aux-Cayes but three days The master informed the George Bickerton that Boyer, the Mulatto-chief who had succeeded Petion, had commenced hostilities against Christophe, whom he engaged and totally defeated, the troops of the latter being in a state of insubordination, having received neither pay nor clothing—that all, to a man, joined Boyer, who together with all the forces stationed at, Aux-Cayes, and the other principal towns under his government, forming en gros, a well-appointed army of forty thousand men, were in full march towards Cape Henry, which, although a place of considerable strength, was not expected to make any defence, the garrison, in common with the rest of the troops, being disaffected towards Christophe, who, it was reported destroyed himself in a fit of despondency.

Three days after the above intelligence was communicated to the George Biskerton (on the 24th of Oct.) she also fell in with and speke a brig off Cape St. Nicholas-Mole, St. Domingo, out four days from Port-au-Prince, which confirmed the above intelligence, and added, that the city of Cape Henry, garrison, forts, &c. in fact all the Haytain possessions, were in the hands of Boyer. The death of Christophe was established beyond all doubt.

Accounts from the Havaunah of the Middle of Oct. have reached us If it be true, as stated in advices from the Spanish Main, that the island of Cuba will be required to pay a monthly contribution of 1,000,000 dollars, for the service of the army under General Morillo; from the temper displayed by the people of that colony, since the adoption of the new constitution in Spain, it seems that the money will be obtained, if at all, with great difficulty. It seems that there is a large party at Havannah in favour of the emancipation of South America; and even those individuals who support the cause of the royalists are but little inclined to make further pecuniary sacrifices, more especially as the merchants and traders have, in some measure, lost a great source of emolument in the slave trade, so much cut up by the activity of the British cruisers on the coast of Africa. A fleet of Spanish merchantmen, under the convoy of three frigates and two corvettes, where the convoy of three inguite and arrived at Havannah on the 13th of October.

We have received letters and papers from the island of Tobago of the 24th of Oct. We are glad to learn that the colony was in a tranquil state; but the late rising of the Blacks had created so much alarm, that the Governor and inhabitants determined to adopt measures to prevent a repetition; and at a general meeting, it was resolved unanimously, that the streets should be patroled for the preservation of lives and property. Application was also made to the Governor of Barbadoes for a reinforcement of troops to quell any insur-rection that might again show itself. This was more necessary, as the blacks although subdued for a time, showed symptoms of insubordination. Several hundred troops had arrived at Tobago from Barbadoes dred troops had arrived at Tobago from Barbadoes, previously to the departure of the advices.

By an arrival from Bombay, papers were received on Wednesday to the 13th of August. The ceremony of proclaiming the accession of His present Majesty took place at Bombay, on the 7th of June, amidst a large assemblage of the natives, together with the principal officers and European inhabitants of Bombay. Towards the close, however, of these demonstrations of loyalty and dutiful affection, a considerable degree of alarm and agitation was created by the explosion of a powder chest on one of the batteries; by which accident six European artillerymen and two Lascars were killed, and one matros desperately wounded. Large fragments of the gun-carriages were hurled to a distance from the spot, and almost every house in the vicinity of the battery suffered from the concussion. His Ma-jesty's ship Carron, Captain Furneaux, was totally lost on the 7th of July, on the coast of Juggernaut; Lt. Stonce, of the Royal Artillery, the Master, and nineteen of the crew, were drowned; the rest only preserved their lives. Uniform tranquillity appears to reign throughout the interior of Hindostan.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY,—DEc. 11.

Bensley v. Pinnock & Maunder.

This case came before the Court under the following circumstances: the Plaintiff is a respectable Printer, and the Defendants are Booksellers in the Strand; some time since Detendants are Booksellers in the Strand; some time sinca he entered into partnership with the Defendants upon an un-derstanding that his name was not to be used, or in other words, that he should be considered what is called a "Sleep-ing Partner." It came, however, to the knowledge of the Plaintiff that notwithstanding the obligation of secresy im-posed upon the Defendants, they had freely used his name in order to obtain morrow and credit, and he according to the order to obtain money and credit, and he accordingly obtained an injunction restraining the Defendants from using the Plaintiff's name, and appointing a receiver.

Mr. Wetherell was heard this day at some length on the part of the defendants for dissolving the injunction. Heen-tered into a refutation of various statements made on the other side, particularly with respect to a debt due to Messrs. Tipper and Fry from the former partnership, and then went on to insist, that so far from that conduct depreciating the assets of the present concern, it in effect increased its value assets of the present concern, it in effect increased its value in no less a ratio than in a sum of 10001; that Mr. Bensley had been a party to the transaction, and in scality had himself part of the money, and received the vouchers for the payments. He dwelt with much force on the increased value of the property under the management of Messrs. Pinnock and Maunder, and on the fact of part of the money being advanced before the agreement of co-partnership had been executed. He was proceeding in his argument, when The Lord Chancellor said, it was nearly time for him to leave the Court, having to attend elsewhere that the Learned Connsel had better proceed with his argument to-morrow.

ounsel had better proceed with his argument to-morrow

Dec. 12.—Mr. Hart, for the plaintiff, proceeded this day to argue in support of the injunction and of the orders for a manager and receiver which the Court had issued. He began with answering that part of Mr. Wetherell's argument which pointed at somuch of Mr. Bensley's affidavit as referred to the payment of the debt of Tipper and Ery. Mr. Wetherell appayment of the dect of Tipper and Ery. Mr. Wetheren appeared to comider that ground as the principal, and, indeed, the only ground, upon which the injunction was obtained.—
He (Mr. H.) begged to say, that was not the chief ground on which he called for the injunction. He had stated that Mr. Bensley was aware for some time of the application of the pastnership capital to the payment of that debt. But the books of the partnership would show that the entries in the cash book as to the receipt and payment of Mr. Bensley's capital were very irregularly made.

[Here the cash book was handed up to his Lordship, and he observed, that several entries were made long after the periods when they ought to have been made.]

Mr. Wetherell said, that his clients could satisfy his Lordship that these entries admitted of a fair and just explanation.

The Lord Chancellor said, that he had no reason to doubt this assurance, but at present the cash book stood as he had

Mr. Hart then proceeded to argue on behalf of the plaintiff, and said he would rest the injunction entirely on the breaches of covenant which the defendants in the course of the partnership transactions had committed. The first circumstance which induced Mr. Bensley to look into the state of this concern, after he became a partner in it, was a demand made upon him to pay an accommodation bill which the defendants had negociated, of the amount of 1501... and which was accepted for them by a friend and relation of theirs of the name of Ashdown. When that acceptance bein consequence, Mr. Bensley, who had known nothing of such bills of accommodation, enquired into the situation of the partnership affairs; and he found that a system of accommodation bills was going on, of which he had no previous knowledge, and on which be naturally felt some alarm. It was said, indeed, that this transaction with Ashdown was comparatively a triffe. But was it less, on that account, a breach of covenant, it having been stipulated, that Mr. Bensley's name was not to be used at all in the partner-ship dealings with other parties? The amount was of no consequence where the covenant was violated. In was the principle, it was the breach of the confidence reposed in the

him in mind of the story of a man who was charged with stealing a pig. "Tis true," he said, "I have stolen a pig, but it was a little pig." But this transaction with Ashdown was not the only one. The defendants also placed several bills in the hands of a stationer of the name of Westley, and in exchange for these bills he gave the defendants his own acceptance. In accounting for this, the defendants said that they found it more convenient to the concern to have Westacceptance for one large sum than several of their own ley's acceptance for one targe sum man severas or their own bills for small amounts in negociation. They might undoubtedly have found this exchange of paper very convenient, but was it not a breach of the articles of partnership? That was the question for the Court to determine. Again, it was most carefully and anxiously stipulated in the articles of partner-ship that the accounts should be kept in a clear and regular manner. Now, was that part of the covenant observed? The accounts were kept in a manner with which no man could be satisfied. He had already handed up the cash book to the Court, in which were found entries that had been made since the 13th of November, the day this injunction was obtained, of transactions which had occurred long before. The Court would find in the cash-book, under the date of May 1820, a fresh sheet pinned in, containing entries of transactions which had taken place long previous to that date.

Mr. Wetherell said, that his clients could give satisfactory explanations on these points, if they had received notice that they would be called on to do so.

Mr. Hart insisted that they had received sufficient notice, as these facts were sworn to in the affidavits. Now was this, he would ask, a compliance with the covenant? Could it be denied that the defendants had entered into a system of paper circulation which rested entirely on the credit of the plaintiff?

It had been denied on the other side, that this case had any similarity to that of Coles v. Galpin. It would be for the Court to judge of that, when it saw that this system of accommend to the court to judge of the cour modation bills was carried on to the extent of £10,000. He would not take up the time of the Court in reading Mr. Bensley's affidavit; he would state generally the result of it to be, that, besides his capital of £2,000, Mr. Bensley was in advance for this concern to the amount of £6,982.

Mr. Wetherell said that the included Bensley's bill for printing, the account of which could not be considered as an advance to the concern.

Mr. Hart contended, that the amount of that bill, £3,700, ought to have been paid a year ago, and, since it was not paid, it must be considered as so much money belonging to Mr. Bensley in the hands of the defendants, and therefore now in advance to the partnership. Altogether, Mr. Bensley stated in his a fidavit, that he was implicated by the transactions of this partnership to an amount of not less than £19,000. There was also a circumstance with which the name of Dr. Irwin was connected, which he thought it necessary to mention. That learned person had performed some literary services for the defendants, for which they engaged to remunerate him; but, instead of doing so, they allowed him to draw bills on them for his own accommodation, and they, in turn, drew bills on him for their own accommodation. Was not this a bills on him for their own accommodation. Was not this a breach of covenant? Further, the defendants sent down to Manchester a person of the name of Chambers, to whom they privately paid, as their servant, a salary of 20s. a week. They furnished him with books of the value of £500, which he was to sell as he could in Manchester. But instead of he was to sell as he could in Manchester. But instead of waiting for the sale being finished, which would necessarily occupy some time, they immediately drew upon him for 2001. and, when the draft was d shonoured, he was obliged to write to the defendants to say that he must abandon the business, as he had no means of discharging that draft. When it was sworn that all these transactions took place without the knowledge of the plaintiff, was it to be denied that they were violent breaches of the articles of artnership? Under these commences he submitted that the injunction was these circumstances, he submitted, that the injunction was obtained on sufficient grounds, and that it ought to remain in force as well as the order for manager and receiver, and mentioned the names of four persons, from whom the defendant obtained advances on accommodation bills, viz. Messrs. Key and Co. Messrs. Grosvenor and Chater, Mr. Westley and Mr. Hodgson. It appeared that this Mr. Hodgson was also the person, who, as accountant, had made several entries in the account books, relative to these accommodation bills, since this injunction had been obtained.

Mr. Wethereil reminded his Lordship of the removal of the account books from the concern by the plaintiff. It would not be in the power of his clients to answer all the statements that had been made relative to the entries in these books, unless the books were sent back to the premises, and the defendants were allowed to inspect them.

Mr. White, the plaintiff's solicitor, said, that if the books were in the power of the defendants, they might burn them.

Mesers. Pisnock and Maunder both expressed their indignation at such a remark as this.

The Lord Chancellor said, that if the defendants, or Hodgson, would make an affidevit between this and to-morrow morning, as to the bare fact of their laving made; or of their not having made, any entries in the books, since the 13th of November, be would, upon seeing that affidavit, be able to say what he ought to do upon this point.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, DEc. 11. Wright v. Cobbett.

Mr. Chitty stated, that this action was brought to remr. Unity stated, that this action was brought to retover a compensation in damages for three several fibels, published by the defendant, in his publication, called "Cobbett's Political Register," dated the 4th of January, 1817, 6th of March, 1819, and 6th of Jan.
1820; all of them importing in substance, that the plaintiff had fabricated accounts between him and the defendant; that under false pretences the plaintiff had obtained money in the defendant's name: that the plaintiff had forged letters in the defendant's name and plaintiff had forged letters in the defendant's name, and particularly one concerning the character and conduct of Mr. Hunt, dated 10 h of April, 1808; that the plaintiff had defrauded the defendent in his accounts; that the plaintiff had, ever since the year 1811, become a notorious spy and informer; and lastly, that he had been instrumental to the death of a gentleman named

The defendant pleaded first, the general issue, "Not Guilty of publishing the alledged libels,") and then pleaded special pleas of justification to all the courts, averring the truth of the alledged libels.

Previous to the case being gone into, Mr. Cobbett, who was without Counsel, rose and said—I have informed Mr, Scarlett, the Counsel for the plaintiff, that I intend to withdraw my pleas. He told me to use my own discre-tion; and I now wish to intimate to your Lordship, for the purpose of saving time, that I mean to withdraw all those that are called the pleas. I do not know exactly what is meant by the record, but I mean to stand upon the general issue.

The Chief Justice—The pleas cannot he withdrawn, in point of form. You mean, I suppose, to say that you don't wish to offer any evidence in support of the pleas of Justification.

Mr. Cobbett—That is what I mean, and I will explain the reason why I do not mean to offer any evidence.
The Chief Justice—That is not necessary at present; you will have another opportunity for that.

The defendant then sat down.

Mr. Scarlett then stated the case to the Jury. He detailed the material facts connected with the case, read the libels in question, and commented on them; and concluded with a powerful appeal to the Jury upon the subject of damages, contending, that unless they awarded a liberal compensation to the plaintiff, there would be an end to that constitutional restraint which they possessed in checking the licentiousness of the press which, unless so restrained, would require a check, it was to be feared, infinitely more powerful and dangerous.

Mr. Henry Hay examined.—I am a printer. (Looking at The Political Register of the 4th January, 1817,) I know that I printed it for Mr. Cobbett, from his manuscript. I also printed the number dated January 6, 1820. I received the manuscript copy from Mr. Dolby. I know Mr. Cobbett's hand-writing perfectly; I am I know Mr. Cobbett's nang-writing possession of the certain the manuscript was in his hand-writing. The manuscript is always returned with the proof. I likewise printed the Number, dated March 6, 1819, for Mr. William Cobbett, Jun. who brought the copy; it was

Mr. T. Dolby, a bookseller, in the Strand, looked at the Register of the 5th of March, 1819, and proved that be published it. He had seen Mr. Cobbett once before he went to America. Witness was employed to publish the number in question, by Mr. W. Cobbett, jun.; he accounted to that Gentleman for the publication a few days afterwards: the first edition of the number was printed by Molyneux; both editions were published was printed by Molyneux; both editions were published by him for account of Mr. W. Cobbett, jun.; the second edition was printed by Mr. Hay.

The alledged libel, dated January 4, 1817, was then read. It was addressed to "George Rose."

Mr. J. Reeves—I knew Mr. Cobbett in the years 1810, and 1811. A letter from the witness to Mr. C. indorsed with the words "Mr. Reeves to Mr. Cobbett" was handed to the witness. The indorses to my recel. Cobbett's hand-writing. The letter brings to my recollection the transaction which took place between us. I remember a proposition respecting his being brought up for judgment; there was an offer on the part of Cobbett, through Mr. Yorke to Mr. Percival. Mr. Cobbett authorized me to say that he was ready to give up his Register, if the Ministers would favour him with respect to his being brought up for judgment.

Mr. John Paul and Mr. William Adams, confirmed the statement as to the reading of the libellous letters before the Committee.

Mr. Cobbett rose to address the Jury. The precept he said, which had been so frequently given to the cobler not to go beyond his last, might, with a small change of the term, be found extremely applicable and useful, if observed by Lawyers. He would state to the Jury the history of their connexion. When he was in America, previous to the year 1800, he gave a commission to a friend to send him some books, who fixed upon this Mr. Wright. Mr. Wright sent out the books and the invoice with them, and the money was punctually paid to him. Their acquaintance, therefore did not commence, as was stated by the Learned Counsel, by Mr. Wright's lending him 201., but by his (Mr. Cobbett's) being an excellent customer to Mr. Wright. The fact as to the draft of 201. was this:—He did not come from America without money or resources, but having stopped at Halifax, in Nova Scotia, longer than he intended, he became short of money; he drew upon Mr. Wright for 201., sending him at the same time a draft, which he had no doubt was paid within 24 hours after his arrival in London. Shortly after their acquaintance commenced Wright fell into dificulties, failed in trade, and in the year 1803 or 1804 was confined in the King's Bench Prison. Mr. C. then went into a variety of matter extraneous to the immediate subject of enquiry, and called witnesses: Mr. C.'s object was he said, to show, that his son was the person responsible for the publications in the Register.

Mr. Clement, proprietor of The Observer, deposed, that he accepted some hills for Mr. Cobbett, previous to his departure for America, in anticipation of the produce of his Register, of which he (Mr. C.) was to be the publisher. He considered Mr. Cobbett himself responsible to him for the acceptances, as the son was

The Clerk of the Stamp Office produced the affidavit, in which Win. Coulett, jun. was, since 1818, registered as the printer, publisher and proprietor of obbett's Weekly Register.

Wm. and John Cobbett, the sons of the defendant, deposed that several alterations were made by them-selves in the manuscript of the Register particularly complained of in this article, as they had inserted the name of Wright, which never appeared in that manuscript. They did so, because they understood that Wright had been exposing the private letters of their father, and slandering his character. Therefore they were anxious that the character of Wright should be throroughly understood.

Mr. Scarlett, in his reply dwelt upon what he called the unnatural and dastardly conduct of the defendant in putting forth his infant sons to meet all the conso quences of his own libelling, whether such libelling should lead to civil actions, the penalties of which they could not afford to pay, or to criminal punishment, which they must be condemned to endure. But he begged the Jury to bear in mind, that the inditing or dictating of a libel rendered the author liable, who ever the publisher happened to be.

The Judge summed up the evidence, and stated the two questions upon which the Jury had to decide. The first, whether the defendant were responsible for the publications complained of, and, the second, what was the quantum of damages which ought to be awarded? The Learned Judge concluded, with the ex-The Learned Judge concluded, with the expression of a hope, that, in deciding the latter question, the Jury would look only to the merits of the case immediately before them, and be guided, as all Juries ought to be, by temperance, and not by prejudice.

The Jury retired, and, after about an hour's deliberation, returned a verdict of 1,0001 damages.

ation, returned a verdict of 1,000l. damages.

DEC. 12.—Dennis v. Talbott.

The Solicitor General stated, that this was an action brought by the plaintiff, a young Gentleman of great respectability, against the defendant who was the keeper of an Asylum for Lunatics, at Bethnal.green, to recover a compensation for an assault and false imprisonment of the person of the plaintiff on the pretence of his being at the time a lunatic, keeping him in confinement from Friday the 2d, to Sunday the 4th of June last, and then liberating him, assigning no reason for so doing. The Learned Counsel stated the case at length to the Jury, and called the following witnesses in support of his statement:

Mr. Williams, Attorney in the Lord Mayor's Court, proved that the plaintiff came to him very young, was afterwards articled clerk to the witness, and ultimately witness, in consequence of his attention to business, and his talent, took him into partnership. This was in March, 1818. He continued to conduct the business of his department with great ability and intense application, till he was taken ill in the beginning of May, 1819. On his recovery he went to the sea-side with his mother; afterwards witness was desirous to dissolve the partnership, as the witness did not approve of having a Person as partner who had been deranged. The plaintiff consented; a deed of separation was prepared, the witness intending to admit him again on the event of his recovery. Soon after, however, Mrs. Dennis died, and the plaintiff came into possession of several hundreds a year; the plaintiff afterwards recovered, and proceeded to settle the partnership affairs with great acuteness and rationality. On the 3d of June, witness received a letter from the plaintiff, desiring to see him at his house in Paradise-row Beth-nal-green.—Witness went immediately, and on his arrival, found two of Mr. Talbott's men there, Witness, asked what acts the plaintiff had been guilty of. The defendant replied he had been firing pictols in his garden, laughing at the Jews Chapel, and shooting at a Chimney-pot. One of the men went to Mr. Talbott, and returned with a letter from Mr. Talbott to the witness; and the man said, his master's instructions were, that they should keep Mr. Dennis, unless he was taken away by force.

Mr. Wolsey, Mr. Burgess, Mr. Boucher, Mr. Russell, and Mr. Wildmore, confirmed the statement of Mr. Williams as to the sanity of mind of the plaintiff.

Dr. Pett, of Hackney, went to see the plaintiff whilst in confinement at his own house, on Sunday, the 4th of June; went at the desire of Mr. Williams, and directed his attention particularly to the state of his mind; had a long and varied conversation with him, which left an precuisoral impression on his mind that which left an unequivocal impression on his mind that the plaintiff was in full possession of his reason. Hedid not discover any symptoms of recent insanity; saw him at liberty on the following day, walking with a friend. His first opinion was confirmed in that, second interview, and having seen him frequently since, he had discovered nothing to make him change his:

Mr. H. Merceron and Mr. Mitchell also spoke to the sound state of the plaintiff's mind.

This closed the plaintiff's case.

Mr. Denman addressed the Jury on the part of the defendant, and contended, that in this case his client had only been discharging his duty, and that with the greatest kindness and indulgence; that in this case the conduct of the plaintiff had justified the conduct of the defendant, and that the certificate of a medical man authorized him in the course he had adopted. He denied that there was any circumstances which called on the Jury to give large damages. The first witness called by Mr. Denman was

J. Dennis, the uncle of the plaintiff, who was ex ployed by him to collect his rents. Recollects his ill-iness in May, 1819; saw him once during his malady, he was at that time strapped down to his bed. He went out of town with his mother in October, and soon after, namely, in November, his mother died. In March, 1820, the witness went to the plaintiff's house on business; Charlotte Orton the maid-servant was in the parlour; she was making up the fire, and the plaintiff put some powder into a fowling piece, and fired at-her; but did no injury. The impression on his mind was that the plaintiff was deranged.

The two keepers of the mad-house, who had him in charge, were examined as to his conduct from the 2nd to the 4th of June, but their evidence did not go to affect the soundness of his intellects.

The Solicitor-General replied.

The Chief Justice summed up, and the Jury, after deliberating half an hour, found a verdict for the plaintiff. Damages, 300l.

JOHN BULL.

LONDON, DEC. 17.

WE commence our Paper without comment or prospectus—our object is speaking plain truth, and we will do our duty.

The shameful licentiousness of a prostituted Press, the infamous tendency of the caricatures which issue from every sink of vice and infamy in and near the Metropolis, the inflammatory speeches of knaves and fools, the absurd unmeaning Addresses to the Queen, and the libellous and treasonable answers given to them, are banes to our Constitution, which call loudly for an antidote. Would that the administration of the salutary medicine we shall exhibit, had fallen into abler hands:-we waited long and patiently, in hopes that some of those commanding talents by which the machine of Government is moved, might have been directed to the humbler but not less useful task of checking and correcting the evils which surround and threaten us; but finding silence (which in some cases is said to give consent) reign amongst those who could ably and authoritatively have met and crushed the malign efforts of faction and sedition, we have ventured to espouse the cause of our King and Constitution -sure, before God, of the justice of our efforts, and the rectitude of our intentions.

The test by which we shall try every thing, is TRUTH—Truth is the sole corrector of the mischiess which stare us in the face, and TRUTH will eventually triumph; as our greatest living poet says—

" All that mortal art hath wrought In our cell returns to nought, The molten gold returns to clay, The polish'd diamond melts away: All is altered, all is flown, Naught stands fast but Truth alone!"

In looking at the domestic politics of the week there is little to interest us, except the birth of a daughter to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Clarence. There seems great probability, from the nature of the Bulletins that the royal infant will live—she has our sincerest prayers. Her plain English name pleases us—it sounds a great deal better to our ears than the foreign flourishes of Alexandrina and Victoria; and to speak truth, we prefer a daughter of the Duke of Clarence to look forward to as Queen, than a niece of the Prince of Saxe Cobourg.

The Queen's holiday last Monday was rather a falling off from the general rule of Bustle. The Merchant Seamen mustered very scantily, and the thousands expected, proved a few hundreds.

On the subject of this sickening woman we shall enter into no arguments or discussions, because they go for nothing at this period of her adventures.

It is useless arguing with people whose blindness has confounded the very distinction they are so anxious to maintain: what argument can be used with those, who, in their zeal, mingle in the Queen's procession to St. Paul's, bearing horns, upon which are tied white ribbons? What effect can reasoning have with people, who, having printed handkerchiefs in commemoration of the Queen's innocence, representing on them the House of Peers, as it appeared during the late proceedings, place a colossal portrait of Bergami over the throne of England? What language can be used to men like Carlile, who writes from his cell, where he is immured for blasphemy, a letter of congratulation to Caroline, and calls it the tribute of a Republican to the Queen?

Disputation on such a point is waste of time and breath; but we have a collection of plain truths to tell, which never should have passed our lips had not the Times. a paper of some weight at Hammersmith, in formed us that the Queen has been playing off a HOAX upon us—as it is all fun, the more fun the better now Christmas is at hand; and we will add our mite to the general mirth, by giving our readers next week a whole confection of little tricks which the Queen has performed with chequered success: to be sure, they were not quite so expensive to the country as her last manœuvre, though, to speak truth, they are full as ingenious—they have no relation indeed to her virtue, but are merely jokes which she got up to make her common honesty suspected, in order that it might come out the clearer.

The Queen began hoaxing very early in life, long before her marriage; and in an early number we shall call up Lord Holland to give us the history of the droll deception she played off at a ball, at which his Lordship was present, upon general Windsor. In short, every body seems to know her turn of mind; and, whether drawing indecent caricatures, or being shut up in a box to be wound up, be the order of the day. we have the unquestionable authority of Sir Howman to believe that her mind is naturally bent to such diversions. We have no objection to these little fantasties,-they are droll and pleasant, and Lady-like and Queen-like; but we must say the Italian witnesses have been nardly treated, for if she was playing a trick on purpose to deceive them, and played it so well, they needed not to have been ahused, vilified, pelted, and half murdered, for giving credit to it: they swore what they believed; they believed what they swore— and so do we.

One part of her scheme seems not to have been, quite so well contrived as the rest, for the Times says, "she reposed under an almost transparent tent, open "also below, above, and having a common gangway round it." To be sure a tent described as this is, with neither top, nor bottom, nor sides, must have been as comical a tent as her heart could have desired; but it strikes us, that if she had wished to be so very funny as to persuade people she was committing adultery. if the tent had been a thick tent and enclosed, the suspicious character of her tête-à-tête or Toe to Toe with her courie would have been greatly Leightened.

But the whole of her suite seem to have been infected with this housing mania. His Excellency Baron Bergami, Grand Master of Saint Caroline, independently of the part he played in the last great hoax, has often shews his admirable dextersy in this pleasing art.

When very young he stole a mule from his father (merely in joke), but he did it so uncommonly well that the old gentleman always believed his son to be a thief:—some time after that, in company with anothed droll dog, whose name was Francesco Salomoni, he played a comical prank upon one Angela Castellini, by forcing open her door and taking away her goods and chattels.

This was so well done, that when he was tried for the offence, the Judges were completely deceived, and sentenced him to eighteen months imprisonment, which he suffered in the prisons of Cremona and Lodi.

Indeed, as we find all that we supposed sin and vice to be mere warrery we shall expose to view the whole store of humosous adventures of which we are in possession.

We were supposing, that had Lord Liverpool the other day been seized with a fit of hoaxing, when he replied to the bit of waggery, the Queen played off in her letter to the King, about the old offender, who was hanged after a long career of forgery and circulation of notes, what a very entertaining answer he might have sent to Brandenburg House:—for instance, here is the Queen's letter to King:—

"The Queen has heard, with pain, that a female is condemned to suffer death on Tuesday, for the offence of passing forged Bank-notes.

"Her Majesty cannot refrain from presuming to recommend this unfortunate person to the mercy of the King. Her Majesty does not enter into any judicial discussion; but from the particular nature of this offence, and the very peculiar state of the law respecting it, she is encouraged to hope that the earnest appeal which her feelings have prompted may not have been made in vain."

" Brandenburgh House, Dec. 3."

This letter naturally gives rise to some reflections; and whether we consider its style and form, addressed as it is to a King, and a husband, or its extraordinary general tendency, we are really at a loss to imagine how the Queen could have had the courage (not to call it assurance) to have despatched it.

There certainly may be something like a fellow

she has espoused. It may be recollected that the Duke of Burnswick's name has been most strangely obtained to some documents in which the Queen is interested; and it should not be forgotten that a bill has been filed in Chancery upon the subject, which yet remains unanswered: it should not be forgotten that the Queen's Attorney General has obtained more than one extension of the time allowed her to reply to this bill, on the plea that she has been too closely occupied with matters of greater weight:—since, however, she can find time to palliate the forgeries of Sarah Price, it is to be hoped that she will now spare a little leisure to a case in which she herself is so deeply implicated.

But, if instead of considering this matter gravely, we were to fancy Lord Liverpool joking on so serious a subject, and writing thus:—

"MADAM,—The person in whose favour your Majesty has been pleased to interfere with the ordinary course of justice, is an old offender, and deserves the punishment which awaits her: indeed, to release such a person, would be to throw upon society a member, from whose conduct much mischief might accrue.

"A female of your Majesty's age some time since presented a letter of credit, for a very large sum, upon the house of Coutts and Co, to a Scotch agent at Trieste. Upon reference to the house in Loudon, it turned out that the letter of credit was a forgery.—Humanity, and the respectability of the culprit's comexions, induced the parties to desist from the prosecution. She, of course, escaped punishment, and the consequence has been, that her subsequent life has been marked by every possible act of indecency and immorality. Your Majesty knows the truth of this story, and may make the application.

This would have been an odd answer; but we will undertake to show that it would have been the only proper one to have given to a hypocrite, whose house are so extensive that it is impossible to discover when she is in joke and when in earnest.

We consider that we cannot do better than extract for our readers the following paragraph from a letter to the run-away Lord Harewood, which was published a few days since in that excellent paper the New Times, under the signature of Caro.

"But what has the King done, I speak of him as a King, for in that character alone did he come to your Bar? He consented to bear the grievances of the man, to remain the husband, and only asked you to preserve his Throne and Crown from pollution. If, from his assumption of the Regency to the present from his assumption of the regency to the present moment, he have been guilty of one tyrannical and unjust action—if he have disregarded the honourand interests of the country—if he have showered its honours on the worthless, and neglected the deserving—if he have manifested the least hostility towards its liberties—if his government rights or violated its liberties—if his government have entailed upon it disgrace and injury—if, in short, one of his public acts have been dishonourable to him as a Sovereign, let it be made known; let him not be spared; let it be stated with all the aggravated colouring which imagination can impart; and, if it cannot be disproved, let him be vilified, as he has been vilified, and abuse could go no further. But let not his reputation be blasted by groundless assertion and invective, and let not those, whose duty it is to strike the slanderer dumb, give currency and the colour of truth to his slanders, by hearing them in silence, and without rebuke. No King who ever wielded the Britanian and the street the street of the st tish sceptre possessed stronger claims to the attach ment—the enthusiastic attachment of his people than George the Fourth, and no one's statue will the historian of the world deck with higher culogies and more splendid trophies. When he assumed the reigns of power he sacrificed his private feelings to filial duties and the interests of his country. His domestic government has been distinguished, perhaps, above all others, for its mildness, and its conscientious regard. for the privileges and freedom of the subject. He found the country engaged in a desperate war, apparently exhausted, without an ally, and without a hope; and under his guidance it rose to the very pinnacle of earthly grandeur. The thunder of his artillery resounded through the world, and its fire struck down every foe; it reached a height of power of which the most ambitious of our forefathers never dreamed, and of glory which hid that of all former ages in its blow. s in its blaze. Every nation upon earth knelt round his throne, the Every nation upon earth aneit round his throne, the proudest to sue for friendship, and the humblest to offer blessings. Why is he now deserted? Why is that praise, which the meanest of his subjects would receive for meritorious conduct withheld? And why is that justice which the meanest of his subjects could obtain denied him? Posterity will judge between him and his ungrateful country, and do justice to his reputation, if it can neither soothe his feelings nor redress his wrongs.

JOHN BULL

American Papers 16 the 18th ult. arrived yesterday bringing the nassage of the President of the United bringing the wassage of the President of the United States to both Houses at the opening of the Fecond Session of the Sixteenth Congress. It is of great length, and we are compelled to give but a brief outline of its features from want of space.

The President congratulates the House upon the improving prosperity of the United States, after the long and convulsive war which hid staken several of the powers of Europe, and which naturally affected America. In speaking of foreign relations, there is this passage in the message.

"Respecting our relations with Spain, nothing explicit can now be communicated. On the adjournment of Congress, in may last, the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at Madrid, was instructed to inform the Government of Spain, that, if his Catholic Majesty should then ratify the treaty, this Government would accept the ratification, so far as to submit to the decision of the Senate the question whether such ratification should be received in exchange for that of the United States to the Secretary of State; it appears, that a communication, in conformity with his instructions, had been made to the Government of Spain, and that the Cortes had the subject under consideration. The result of the deliberations of that body, which is daily expected, will be made known to Congress as soon as it is received. The friendly sentiment which was expressed on the part of the United States, in the Mes-age of the 9th of May last, is still entertained for Spain. Among the causes of regret, however, which are iuse; arable from the delay attending this transaction, it is proper to state, that satisfactory information has been received, that measures have been information has been received, that measures have been recently adopted by designing persons, to convert certain parts of the province of East Florida into depots for the reception of foreign goods, from whence to samuggle them into the United States. By opening a port within the limits of Florida, immediately on our boundary, where there was no settlement, the object could not be misunderstood. An early accommodation of differences will, it is hoped, prevent all such fraudulent and pernicious practices, and place the relations of the two countries on a very anticable and permanent basis."

A brief allusion is made to the commercial restricts

A brief allusion is made to the commercial restrictions imposed upon the intercourse between the United States and the British West India and American colonies; restrictions, it is observed, which, "it is satis-factory to recollect, are defensive only," on the part of the former. It is also added that "the experiment is advancing in a spirit of amily between the parties." The question depending between the United States and Great Britain, respecting the construction of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, has even-referred by both Governments to the decision of the Emperor of Russia, "who has accepted the umpirage." The discussions between France and the United States rescussions between France and the United States rescussions. is advancing in a pirit of amily between the parties. pecting the new tonnage duty upon French vessels, are to be carried on at Washington, whither the French Minister Plenipotentiary was ordered to repair for the purpose. With respect to the revenues of the United States, they are represented as in a flourishing condition. Within the five years from 1815 to 1690, the national debt, which amounted altogether to upwards of one hundred and fifty-eight millions of dollars, had been audired and fity-eight millions of dollars, had been reduced to about nin-ty-two millions. The rapid progress of the fortifications erecting along the coasts of the Union, and the increase of the navy, are also dwelt upon with much satisfaction. It then states—

"The receipts into the Treasury from every source, to the 30th September last, have amounted to 16,794,107 doll. 66 c., whilst the public expenditures, to the same period, amounted to 16,871,534 doll. 72 c.; leaving in the Treasury, on that day, a sum estimated at 1,920,000 doll. For the probable receipts of the following year, I refer you to the statement which will be transmitted from the Treasury.

"The sum of three millions of dollars, authorised to be raised by lean by an act of the lest Surings.

to be raised by loan, by an act of the last Session of Congress, has been obtained upon terms advantageous to the Government, indicating not only an increased confidence in the faith of the nation, but the existence of a large amount of capital seeking that mode of investment, at a rate of interest not exceeding five per cent. per annum.

"It is proper to add, that there is now due to the Treasury, for the sale of public lands, twenty-two millions, nine hundred and ninety-six thousand, five hundred and forty-five dollars."

The house of Representatives found an extraordinary difficulty in electing a new Speaker in the room of Mr. Clay, who resigned. There were four candidates, but the successful one must have an absolute majority of the whole number of votes. The number of baltottings, which amounted to twenty-one, is said to be wholly without any precedent. At last the choice fell upon Mr. John Taylor, who was elected by a majority of fone. or lour.

The Journal de Paris of the former day contains a private letter from Vienna, dated the 2d inst. which states with confidence, that the final resolutions of the Soversigns relative to the affairs of Naples, will be officially promulgated in the course of the present month; but that decision depends upon the manner in which their communication dispatched to Naples shall be received. he received. The answer is expected about the 15th.

LIES, MISREPRESSAPATIONS, &c.

As it is not with the Sovereign that we have ever quarrelled, but with Ministers, who, in our judgment, and we verify believe in that of the whole nation, ought, long since, to have been dismissed from his confidence, we lament to hear that His Majesty has, within these few days experienced a severe attack of illness. Our information states that he has been twice bled, and that no less than thirty ounces of blood were taken from him at each operation. Nothing would gratify us more than the prospect of His Majosty retaining such a hold of life as might enable him to recover, by a change of councils and of measures, that whole stock of popularity which he once enjoyed; and we are, therefore, not merely grieved for his indispositions, as for those of a fellow-mortal, but alarmed when we hear of their serious return—lest, by their unfavourable issue, may be frustrated a dutiful and patriotic hope, when seemingly not far from its fulfilment.—Times, Dec. 16th, 1820. JOHN BULL. A singular affair has been lately the subject of convernation at Vienna. A noble Lore has had the masfortune, at the Congress of Troppau, to incur the displeasure of an Imperial gress of Troppan, to incur the displeasure of an Imperial personage; at whose suggestion, and on whose recommendation, that grave hody was assembled. This potentiate was the first to complain of the Minister in question, for absenting himself from the conferences, and requested Prince Metternich to call upon him for an explanation of this imputed irregularity. Prince Metternich, as we are informed, wrote a letter; at which his lordship, feeling burt, set out immediately for Vicnna, to make preparations for his departure. He thence returned to Troppan, where an onen charge with diately for Vienna, to make preparations for his departure. He thence returned to Troppau, where an open quarrel with Prince Metternich ensued. The latter submitted the conduct of his adversary to the Sovereigns, who enjoined the Prince not to fight. On this the Emperor of Abstria, it is said, ordered a courier to be despatched immediately to London, with a request that the Englishman might be forthwith recalled. His Lordship, though supported in his situation at Vienna by the influence of Lord Viscount Castlereach, has never enjoyed any political consideration, or reagh, has never enjoyed any political consideration, or been treated with much personal regard in the capital of the Austrian empire.

Austrian empire.

We insert this statement without being able to give any other authority for its truth than the respectability of the source whence we have derived it. It has been in our possession for some time past, but we forbore to publish it from delicacy to the noble person to whom it relates. Seeing, however, that it was aliuded to yesterday by a respectable contemporary, and observing that it obtains some additional probability from the rumoured recall of the aforesaid nobleman to this country, we now give it to our readers. We annex the paragraphs from the French papers:—

"VIENNA, Nov. 24.—Lord Stewart, the British Ambassador who arrived here the night before last, will return no more to Troppau."—Monticur.

"Aussburg, Nov. 30.—At Vienna a new Ambassador is immediately expected from England. We are assured that Lord Stewart will return, without delay, to London."—Gasette de France.—Times, Dec. 15.

Gasette de France.—Times, Dec. 15.

An improbable and ridiculous story has been circulated during the last two or three days, by the Morning Chronicle and Times, relating to an alledged fracas at Troppau between Lord Stewart, our Ambassadot to the court of Vienna, and Prince Metternich; the American Blinkner. We think it necessary to state, that the whole affair is nyterly without foundation. Its preposterous absurdity, indeed, ought to be a sufficient refutation; but as something of credibility may possibly attach to a story so confidently repeated. we have possibly attach to a story so confidently repeated, we have thought it desirable to give it this unqualified contradiction. thought it desirable to give it this unqualined contradiction. No such circumstances have occurred—no representation has been received in England, respecting Lord Stewart; the best understanding subsists, and has subsisted, between his Lordship and the Austrian Minister; and the assertion of his return to this country is entirely false.—Courter, Dec. 12, 1820.

THE STATUE OF MEMNON.—The Russian Ambassadors at the Court of Rome, has received a letter from Sir A. Smith, an English traveller, who is at present at the Egyptian Thebes. He states, that he has himself examined the celebrated statue of Memnon, accompanied by a numerous escort. At six o'clock in the morning he heard merous escort. At six o'clock in the morning he heard very distinctly the sound so much spoken of in former times, and which had been generally treated as fabulous:

—"One may," he says, "assign to this phenomenon a thousand different causes, before it could be supposed to be simply the result of a certain arrangement of the stones." The statue of Memnon was overturned by an earthquake, and it is from the pedestal that this mysterious sound is emitted, of which the cause has never been ascertained, and which was denied, merely because it was ascertained, and which was denied, merely because it was inexplicable .- Paris Paper.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE

TO THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWN.

My Long. It is not my intention to flatter your Lordship. As little do I desire to offend your selflove by unmerited obloquy or reproach. If I speak "Home Truth," it is because a temporary delusion must not be permitted to fix itself permanently upon the public mind. These may, in some degree, be repugnant to the prejudices of your Lordship; but their very novelty will be refreshing in these times of fraud and imposture !

That I entertained a more favourable opinion of your Lordship's character previous to the late proceedings in Parliament, than I am ever likely to do again, I am ready to admit; but as my judgment was influenced by the qualities of your Lordship's heart rather than by the endowments of your mind, I will not offend you by defining the limits within which my general sentiments respecting you, were cir-

By a curious and unlooked for concurrence of events, your Lordship's political life may be said to have commenced under circumstances of peculiar advantage, considering the prejudices of education. Nominally engaged in the ranks of Whig Opposition, you really became a subaltern under a leader, whose principles, whether directed in the line of service-or in hostlity to the government, were calculated at all times to give weight and authority to any party, arrayed under his bauner. It was my Lord Grenville who gave a body and a form to the scattered remnant of a party, which had long been at variance with itself, and in the lowest contempt with the Public. The accession of his name and influence inspired the vain boast of the Whigs, that All the Talents of the State were held in monopoly by them; and the man who had been almost the exclusive object of their vituperation during the most brilliant period of his life, was hailed as a saviour of their own sinking fortunes, and the harbinger of a power which had long faded from their hopes, like an idle or deceptive dream! It is not my pupose my Lord, to dwell upon the short and feverish realization of those hopes; or on the ingenious policy which contrived, in the course of one year's administration, to tarnish our laurels, and degrade the British arms in three distinct services. I shall pass over the facetious experiment of your Lordship and your colleagues upon national credulity, in doubling the Income Tax upon the people, whom you had urred almost to revolt against the former Ministers, for what you then termed an unheard of and oppressive mode of raising money upon them. It is equally unnecessary to illustrate the jealousy of constitutional principles for which your friends, my Lord, have been so long distinguished. by a reference to their appointment of the Chief Justice to a seat in the Cahinet, and of the First Lord of the Treasury to be the auditor of his own accounts. If such measures could ever be considered venial, the personal characters of my Lord Greuville and Lord Ellenborough might afford grounds of exculpation: but such a plea cannot be urged, with even a decent grace, by men, whose whole stock in trade consist of professions of rigid and unbending adherence to the forms, as well as the spirit of the Constitution! A change of sentiment, when in power, may be very natural-but it is not the less

Upon one point, my Land, you were consistent; and it was to be expected, should the occasion present itself, that men who had been accustomed to sacrifice largely to the passions and prejudices of the millitude, would not scruple to betray their Sovereign, if they found it necessary to the interests, of the party. The character of the proceeding to which I allude, must rest upon its own intrinsic merits: I commend it, not for its policy or its patriotism, but as a solitary instance of Whig consistency during its short existence in power. It might long have stood on record with out a parallel, had not the same master spirit which originally inspired it, supplied us with one, which may boast of the success which was wanting to the other. The trick which would have cajoled one Monarch into the breach of his Coronation perjury against has royal con science, may be well measured against the dexterous manocuvre of the Divorce Clause, by which another Monarch is defrauded of his rights, and denied that justice, by " the influenced votes" of a faction, which the meanest and humblest of his subjects may demand at the ordinary tribunals of the country!

There is only this difference between the cases that in the former instance, your Lordship's Party sustained the double loss of character and of place in the latter, place being out of the question, the amount of injury sustained in so righteous a cause,

It is not to reproach you, my Lord, that I recall to your recollection the sentiments of the country upon your dismissal from Office. It would be difficult to say whether the Reformers, whom you have courted out of office, or the great body of your countrymen whom you have disgusted, when in office were most sincere in the exultations which followed you to your retirement. My Lord Grenville foresaw his difficulties. The party was a dead weight upon their leader; and he who had proudly and magnanimously baffled the enterprizes of Republican France, and dissipated the league of Jacobinism at home, was himself overborne by a coalition, which, divided in principle, and discordant in materials, became a byword among its adherents, and the laughing-stock of the people.

Your Lordship was young; and the world gave you credit for something more than had yet been displayed of character or talent during your short career. They augured well of you, from your apparent leaning towards the Noble Lord who had given the appearance of consistency to the body of Whigs. The inference that my Lord Grey held you not in bond, was still further in your favour. His Lordship has long exhibited the extraordinary phenomenon of a man sacrificing every thing to popularity, and of never being popular. You, my Lord, might have rendered yourself essentially so, had you taken another model. There have been occasional symptoms of moderation about your Lordship's conduct which induced the hope that in the division of the Party, you would have disclaimed to join the rump, which cannot even sustain itrelf numerically without the aid of such men as Hume, Moore, Creevy, and Wilson! But that hope has passed away with the other illusions of the day. Your Lordship might have redeemed yourself, by abandoning the interests of a party for the good of your country. I know such an effort to be beyoud the ordinary strength of a man regularly trained in the school of modern Whiggery.

I have already spoken of the advantages your Lord-ip possessed. The character of Lord Grenville suip possessed. would have been a sufficient justification of your Lordship's preference. His motives could not be suspected, for he had forsworn power; whilst those with whom he can no longer, conscientiously act, have betrayed their motives to the veriest drivellers in political intrigue. You have, my Lord, taken your line. Still, as no name entertains a higher value than myself for your Lordship's moral character, I feel a hope, that in drawing your aftention, which it is my wish to do, to what appears to me to be the inevitable consequence upon the minds, the habits, and institutions of civil society, of the principles which your Lordship has of late been induced to advocate I take the only chance of qualifying the mischievous tendency of your politics, and of drawing upon your private virtues, for an antidote to your public errors.

I have the honour to be, my Lord, yours, FITZ HARDING.

We believe the publication of this list has done much can lose nothing by speaking the truth, will you towards showing the public opinion as to the Queen's character: but a mere publication of the names is not quite enough. As these ladies come forward to vouch for the Queen's purity, it seems just and natural to en-quire into the value of their evidence, and the metives which have induced them to distinguish themselves in this marked and indelicate manner from all the other women in England. We shall, therefore make a few observations on each of them, and if they find reason to regret the notoriety thus conferred upon them, let them recollect, that it is not we, but they who have solicited public attention—that it is not we who have called them forth, but they who have blazoned themselves as the Queen's associates; and as our old law allowed a man to bring what were called compurgators to his character, so when these ladies offer themselves as compurgators for the Queen, they fairly throw their own characters for trial on the country :-- WHICH COUNTRY WE ARE.

Mrs. and Mas Wood.

Mrs. Wood is, we helieve, the wife of Mr. Alderman Wood, and not Mrs. Wood, of Lisle-street, as has been erroneously reported: let it, however, he told to Mrs. Wood's credit, that, notwithstanding the silly and conspicuous part played by her husband, Mrs. Wood is said to have resisted, for many months, his commands to visit the Outen, a delay more honourable to the poor Alderman the Queen, a delay more honourable to the poor Aldermaness than the tardy visit uself ultimately was to her to whom it was made. Of Miss Wood, we shall say no more than to pity her for having a father, who has brought her beauty, her youth, and her innocence into such society. Mrs. Beaumont and two Misses Beaumont.

The real name of these ladies is Barber, they being the wife and daughters of John Thomas Barber, heretofore a miniature painter in Southampton-street, Covent-Garden; and who has assumed (God knows why) the name of Beaumont; and these are the grandees, upon whose visits a Queen of England is constrained to rest her claim to character and reputation!

Mrs. Brougham. This, we presume, is the lady of the Diabolus Regine, or Queen's Attorney-General. We are sorry that this lady has had the imprudence to oblige us to refer our readers to the newspapers, in which they will find that the advertisement of her marriage and that of the birth of her first child followed one another much more closely than has been usual in " well regulated families."

Mrs. Wilde and Mrs. Denman.

The wives of two of the Queen's lawyers: women, for aught we know, of respectability in their own little way; and who, we will venture to say, will never voluntarily condescend (humble as they are) to defile themselves with the society of the Queen. We believe that it will be found that their respective husbands, by a pious fraud, wrote their ladies' names at the outer gate of Brandenburgh-house; and it is on this supposition that some of the ladies of Russel-square and Guildfordstreet do still visit Mrs. Wilde and Mrs. Denman.

The Hon. Mrs. Wilde and Mrs. Denman.

The Hon. Mrs. Damer,

Is a doating old woman, formerly celebrated as a statuary—a proficient, indeed, in an art, the practice of which is not greatly conducive to female delicacy. The Queen's acknowledged admiration of the naked human figure, and her removal of the fig-leaf from the statue of Adam, probably won the heart of the antiquated stone-cutress which indeed if she he not quated stone-cutress, which, indeed, if she be not greatly belied, has always been strangely susceptible of the charms of her own sex.

The Duchess of Somerset.

This high sounding title will dwindle much in our readers' estimation, when they have the horse the sounding title will dwindle much in our readers' estimation.

readers' estimation, when they hear that her Grace is nothing but the sister of Lady Anne Hamilton! On the private conduct of either of the sisters (the latter of whom never has been married), it is unnecessary to make any observation, as Lady Anne Hamilton's soli-tary and salaried devotion to the Queen, sufficiently explains her sister's visit.

Lady Hood. Of this Lady it will be necessary only to observe, that her husband is the Captain Hood whose name makes no inconsiderable figure in the Delicate Investigation, and who is particularly known as the person in the habit of driving the Queen in a buggy, loug before she knew Bergami

Lady Tankerville,

Is the wife of the Earl of Tankerville, and mother of those resplendent geniuses, the little Lord Ossulston, and the great Mr. Henry Grey Bennett.

The only feeling which could have induced this respectable Countess to listen to the solicitations of her son to visit the Queen, must have been one of sympathy, which the name of Caroline, mixed up with a disgraceful and criminal affortion for a menial servant, must naturally have awakened in her breast. This family feeling will account also for the visits of LADY MARY BENNETT AND THE HON. MRS. BENNETT.

TO HENRY BROUGHAM, Esq. M. P. SIR—Perceiving that a majority of the common Council of London have, in the plemetade of their graciousness and wrong headedness, voted you the Freedom of the City, envolped in a wooden box, (because, as they prudently observe, gold and silver ones are convertible), I took the trouble of reading the resolution which confers this most honourable distinction upon, and place you on a level with Colonel Wardle, and I find that it is bestowed in manifesta tion of the " inviolable integrity, unshaken firmness, and distinguished talents, which you have displayed in defending the Queen," &c.

Now, Sir. that you have got the Freedom, and havehe goodness, in order to satisfy the eminent dunes of Guildhall of their imbecility, to answer the folloring question:-

Di you, or did you not, at the time the Queen apointd you her Attorney-General, make an offer to His lajesty's Government, to abandon her case, and servie all together, if they would bestow upon you a silk own and patent of precedence, to place you in the ome standing at the Bar as you knew the Quen's Attorney-Generalship would give you?

Whatever your answer may be to this question, it shall be published in this paper next Sunday, if you choos to favour me with one. If not, may I be allowel, on that day, to felicitate that great body, to whon I have ventured to allude, upon the whimsical appropriation of their much sought honours?—I am, Sir, with all due respect for one of the Corporation of London as it exists, yours, JOHN BULL

THEATRICAL REVIEW.

Priviously to commencing this article the Proprietos of John Bull beg to make their acknowledgments to such of the Managers of Theatres and places of amusement in and near the Metropolis as have dered them the free admission to their respective etablishments, usually granted to the "Public Press" and at the same time, in their own names, and hat of their Editor, they beg, with every proper some of the intended obligation, to decline any such avour.

COVENT GARDEN.

The Managers of this Theatre continue to play that larmess piece of boyish bombast, WALLACE, for wint of something better, which one would think it could not be very difficult to find; but, as if determined to to show the poverty of their materials and the emptiess of their dependents, they have produced a Melo-trame by the same author.

The performance is worse than Wallace, inasmuch as it is dull and not ridiculous. One can laugh at Walkee, but the Warlock of the Glen is opium. A more stupid vehicle for trashy dialogue, old scenery, and lad music, we never encountered. We would seriody advice the genius who has put forth these thing, to give over making such comical tragedies and serious farces; it is a trade at which he will never do rauch; it is all very well in these times, when fifty people constitude an audience; but wait till it become the fishion to go to the play again (which it may some day, and then let Master Walker try his hand at a five act piece, -not all the orators in Westminster would save him from perdit on.

A. Mr. Vangruffinhoff has made his entrée in Lear; we orbear to find fault with his acting, because Lear is it truth an ardous undertaking, but we take leave to find fault with his taste in selecting it for a debut. In the first scene, Mynheer Vangruffinhoff was very diguified, and as much like Kemble as he could contrive to make himself; but all imitation are silly things; imittions of Kean, indeed, spring up on every hand, because ill-nursed little men with bandy legs, and hackney coach-men voices are by no means rarein low life, and the facility of copying vulgarity and ignorance has been proved by the perfect success which has attended the efforts of his disciples; but it is dangerous even for a man as good looking as Mytheer Vangrustinhoff to call to one's recollection such a being as John Kemble. The magnificent courtenance, the graceful action, the classical adornments of his mind, all flash across one the moment we see a new comer striving to attain his excellencies by aricaturing his feelings-Mynheer Vangruffinhoff fully succeeded in bringing John Kemble sufficiently to our recollection to make us lament that we were obliged to bear with him; it was such a recollection as the flavour of garlick gives one of yesterday's French dinner.

charles Kemble's Edgar is too well known to need cubgy now; it is a piece of acting of the first classalmost all the other parts were well sustained—if we exept a Mrs. Hill, who in this case deserves indulgeice, because she was unprepared for the character, and called suddenly to it by the indisposition of Ms. Faucit. We must be allowed, however, to expres our surprise that while there are abundance of young and beautiful actresses playing in the country such a person as this Mrs. Hill can hold her grund in one of the regular theatres; for though her merit is equal to her modesty, it is difficult to say wich she disgusts us with most, her inability or her agurance.

Miss Foote is as lovely as ever—and is still Miss Fote. Oh, men of taste and wealth, where are ye? DRURY LANE.

as nobody goes to this Theatre, criticisms upon the performances are supermous—the faculations of the VESTRIS in MIDAS, and Giovanni in London drew a select few to the House for a night or two; her figure is seen and her voice heard to the greatest advantage: but tonjours perdris is palling diet, and even the most bewitching actress of the day fails to attract as con actress, after a three months' constant exhibition of the same parts.

A dreadful accident happened here on Monday during the representation of the last mentioned entertainment: the rope by which a dragon was suspended, and on which a boy rode in the air, broke when the machine was at the height of upwards of twenty feet, and the lad was precipitated on the stage: he was most dangerously hurt and carried to the Middlesex Hospital without hopes of recovery Fortunately for public feeling it happened at this house: the fewer persons who witness such accidents the better.

At the Sans Pareil Mr. Alderman Waithman's nephew, a son of a tailor of the name of Reeve, advertises his benefit "Under the Patronage of the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London!" This seems one step lower in the scale of patronizing than even the sanction of Her Highness the Princess of Cumberland! because as that person is no longer on the stage, where she was went to be, public curiosity may be excited to see a woman who makes such a goose of herself; but to suppose that any body would pay sixpence to see the Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs is a supposition one could hardly have imagined the most sanguine actor, or the most affectionate nephew to have fallen into, more especially when it is recollected, that the only one of the three persons in question at all notorious, may be seen yard in hand gratis, with half his family into the bargain every day, at his shop in Bridge-street, Blackfriars, where he continues to sell the greatest bargains in linen drapery and shawls ever offered to the public.

Talking of Her Highness the Princess of Cumberland, an anecdote is related of the late Mr. Harris, of Covent Garden Theatre, in which she figures: she was, as many people remember, an actress in this Theatre; and, as all people who remember that, must also remember a very bad actress. Mr. Harris being heartily tired of her, determined to get quit of her, and with that view sundry little persecutions which Thespian tyrants know how to inflict, were played off upon her, Resenting this, she wrote a letter of remonstrance, to her mimic mo-march, in terms not more respectful than a Common Council address to a real one, though, perhaps better spelt and more gramatically composed. Harris, who was famous for hurried writing and short notes, addressed an answer to her in these

" My DEAR Mrs. S.—Every thing shall be settled your satisfaction. Yours, T. II." to your satisfaction.

At the same time he wrote a note to Lewis, the manager, of which the following is a literal copy.

"DEAR LEWIS,—D—n that Mrs. Serres, we must trid of her. Yours, T. H." get rid of her.

Unfortunately in the hurry of business, the notes were misdirected, and were delivered cross-wise to the parties: what the censequences were we know not; but the whimsicality of the mistake has rescued Her Highness's real name from oblivion for

The Olympic Theatre seems to be making most rapid strides into public favour. Dowton, the best actor of the day, is engaged there. Wrench, whose talents are hardly sufficiently appreciated in London, is manager. That outre grimacier, Mr. Oxberry, is the Liston of the establishment; and the whole company generally, is far superior to those usually met with in the smaller places of amusement.

OLD BAILEY, Drc, 11.

Edward Lewis was capitally indicted for stealing a watch, value 3l. and upwards, the property of John Power, in a dwelling-house,

It appeared from the evidence, that the prosecutor an Irishman) and his wife arrived in London, from Ircland, early on the murning of the 25th November, and went into the first public-house they came to in Piccadilly for the purpose of taking some refreshment, when the prisoner came in, and got in conversation with them, in the course of which he observed that they must be fatigued, and tendered his services to procure them a lodging. They thankfully accepted the offer, and he conducted them to a house in Westminster where they went to bed. While they were asleep, the prisoner went into the room and took the prosecutor's watch from the head of the bed. He was apprehended the same day at a Pawnbroker's shop.

He was found guilty of stealing to the value of 39s.

James M'Nabb and Samuel Mears were capitally indicted for assaulting Sarah Norris on the highway, and stealing from her person a thimble, a watch-key, and sixpence in money, her property.

paran Norris deposed, that she lived servant at the Rose public-house, Islington, and on the evening of the day stated in the indictment, as she was carrying beer at some distance from her master's house, the two prisoners and another man came from off a wall on the road side, and seizing her arms thrust her against the wall. One of them stopped her mouth, anotherpinioned her arms and threw her on the ground, when she fainted. When she recovered she found that her pockets had been turned inside out, and the trifling articles mentioned in the indictment stolen.

Cross-examined by the prisoner M'Nebb.—She did at first say before the Magistrate, that the prisoners were not the men who had robbed her, but she did so at the suggestion of her father, who said that the expense of prosecuting would be very heavy upon her. Upon being sworu, however, and informed that the expense would fall upon the county, she swore they were the men, and she was now positive of the fact.

Mr. Baron Garrow told the Jury, that although he did not think the prosecutrix had acted intentionally wrong, thought it would be too hazardous upon such testimony to go further into the case, affecting, as it did, the lives of the prisoners. Verdict—Not Guilty.

DECEMBER 12.—James Tobin, a young man of remarkably genteel appearance, was put to the bar, upon a capital indictment, charging him with assaulting Charles Overall, on the highway, putting him in fear, and taking from his person 5s. in money, his property. There was a second indictaent, charging the prisoner with robbing Mr. Overall, of 10l. in Bank notes, under the same circumstances, but this was not

Mr. Charles Overall deposed, that he is an assistant to his brother, an opulent tradesman, residing at 122, Lower Thames-street, and on the 24th of October last, while in the warehouse, the prisoner came in, and begged to speak to him out-side; witness stepped out, and the prisoner, first looking witness stepped out, and the prisoner, and lower carefully round, said, "you don't know who I am, do you?"
Witness replied in the negative, and the prisoner then said,
"My name is Johnson, I am a Bow-street officer, and have a warrant against you for an unnatural offence." Witness was horror-struck at the charge, but replied that it was false, and demanded to know who was his accuser? The prisoner said, that did not matter; that his brother was an attorney; that they had often settled affairs of this kind between parties, and he asked the witness if he would not give a sum of money to make it wp, rather than have his name and character exposed? Witness asked the prisoner what sum it would require; and he said that the last "joh of this sort" that he and his hrother (the attorney) had, was for a gentleman at the most of the them. the west end of the town, and he gave them 95 guineas. Witness said, he could not raise so much, as he had litle more. than his regular earnings; upon which the prisoner asked if he could raise 501, and bade him romember that his character, nay, probably, his very existence depended upon it! Witness said be would try what he could do, and an appointment was and be would try wint in count on, and an expension of them to meet in an adjoining street the next evening. As the prisoner was going away, he said, "Oh! I want some loose silver, give me what you have about you;" and witness gave him &s. and then returned to the warehouse. They met the following evening, and the witness gave him 101. but with this be seemed much dissatisfied, and another appointment was made for the following night, at an adja-cent public-house. Witness, scarcely knowing what steps to take, applied to a young woman named Catharine Thomas, with whom he had formerly collabited, and on relating the circumstances to her, she agreed to accompany him to the pub-lic-house. They had not been long there before the prisoner came in, and beckened to the witness to follow him out, but the young woman desired him, if he had any thing to commu-nicate, to say it there. He seemed angry, and a sharp alter-cation emued between him and Catherine Thomas. He then cation ensued between him and Catherine Thomas. He then said it would be the worse for the witness, and desired him to meet him the next morning, at Bow-street office. Catherine Thomas said, "No, he shall not meet you at Bow-street, but at the Mansion Home." To this the prisoner seemed to agree, and went away, and witness and the wonan were waiting nearly the whole of the next day, but he did not make his appearance. In the evening, however, an ther fellow came to him with a message from the prisoner, to demand more money, but he refused to give him any, and his brother, Mr. — Overall, to whom he had commented all that had occurred, caused this messenger to be taken into entrody, and conveyed to the Mansion House. Two cated all that had occurred, caused this measurager to be taken into emitody, and conveyed to the Mansion House. Two or three days afterwards the prisoner was taken into castody. He parted with his money from no other cause but the fear of a public exposure, and the consequent ruin of his character. Catharine Thomas corroborated the statement of Mr. Overall, as far as her knowledge went.

Mr. Overall, brother to the prosecutor, was called in corroboration of his brother's statement.

Authors Marsion the City Marshalman, deposed that on corroboration of his brother's statement.

Anthony Harrison, the City Marshalman, deposed, that on the 29th of October, in consequence of an application from the prosecutor, he proceeded in search of the prisoner, and on the Thursday evening following, Mr. Overall came to the Mansion House, with a man named Simmons, in his castody, and witness the same evening, apprehended another man, named Johnson. They were examined the following day, and in consequence of further information, witness went with Mr. Overall and Catherine Thomas, on Friday evening, to a public-house in Long, Acre, where, in a two pair of stairs back room he found the prisoner and two other men. He took him into custody, and informed him of the nature of the offence with which he was accused: upon which he said, he certainly had the money, but it was not "thate!" meaning that it was not obtained under the threat described. Simmons and Johnson were discharged.

mons and Johnson were discharged.

The prisoner made a very long and artful defence, which consisted almost entirely of horrible accusations against his prosecutor.

Harrison was recalled, and declared that the prisonar, when at the Mansion House, making accusation against the prosecutor, nor did he make the deence which he had now made. Witness heard the prisoner say, as he was leaving the Mansion House—"I dare say they'll hang me, but I don't care for that I'll'open such a scene when I come to the Old Bailey!" the Old Bailey!"

The Recorder summed up, the evidence, and the Jury merely turned round in the box and pronounced the prisoner Guil'y—Death. He heard the verdict unmoved.

Mr. Law said, although he had defended the prisoner, he perfectly concurred in the propriety of the verdict given by the Jury.

POLICE.

MANSION HOUSE.—Street Robberies.—Several notorious thieves were brought before the Lord Mayor, charged by the officers with having paraded the streets for the purpose of plundering the public.

The Lord Mayor ordered that each of them should be sent to Bridewell for a month's hard labour. . His Lordship ordered the officers to bring before him all the bad characters the could catch a hold of in the city undersuspicious circumstances, observing, at the same time, that he was determined to punish, as far as lay in his power, those characters who associated together with the view of hustling passengers. The reat number of robberies that took place nightly in the metropolis rendered it indispensably necessary to pursue the most severe course; and he trusted that the vigilance of the city police would not be found incapable of clearing the streets of the desperate fellows who had daily and nightly infested them.

A CASE OF MISERY.—A girl who is about sixteen years of age, the daughter of an unfortunate old man named Wilks, who resides in North-street, Bethnal-green, was brought before the Lord Mayor upon a charge of having associated with a gang of young thieves, and having been concerned in stealing some bottles of pickles.—The father of the girl appeared before his Lordship. He is in his 68th year, and said that he had a wife and six daughters, whom he found it impossible to support—his only way of earning a subsistence being by selling hearth-stones, an employment laborious enough, but extremely unprofitable. It was no slight addition to his calamity of being miserably poor, that his children turned out badly. Two of them were living by prostitution, and spurned at all intreaties to return home. The girl before his Lordship was treading in the footsteps of her sisters, and he had reason to fear that a worse disgrace than prostitution awaited her. The other three daughters were yet young, but having such dreadful examples before them, and being without the care of a mother, he apprehended their chance of meeting with a better fortune was extremely small.

care of a mother, he apprehended their chance of meeting with a better fortune was extremely small.

The Lord Mayor gave the old man some silver, and desired him to go to the parish officers, who, he had no doubt, would relieve such unparalleled distress.

The girl having assured the Lord Mayor that she would reform her conduct and pay attention to her father, was sent away with him to the parish officers.

Bow Stheet.—Assault Extraordinary.—Andrew Milne, a youth of fifteen, stating himself to be a compositor at the Convier newspaper office, was brought before the magistrate yeareday morning from St. Martin's watch-house, charged with a most outrageous assault upon Mr. M. Matthewson, a gold and silver refiner, residing in Long Acre.—It appeared by the evidence of Mr. Matthewson and another gentleman, that on the preceding night between ten and eleven o'clock, by the evidence of Mr. Matthewson and another gentleman, that on the preceding night between ten and eleven o'clock, they were walking through Spring Gardens, when the prisoner with three or four other lads, about the same age and appearance, rudely took the wall of them, and attempted to thrust them off the pavement. Mr. M. and his friend reproved them for this rudeness, and were passing on, when the prisoner and his companions followed, calling them dandies, exquisites, &c. Mr. M. then turned back, seized the prisoner by the collar, and told him if he did not desist from his insoftence he would send him to the watch-house. "Oh, ho! will you so," instantly replied the prisoner; "come I'll shake your commission for you!" and then drawing something from under his jacket, he began fighting with him right and left. Mr. M. at first thought it was an umbrella he was beating him with, till in enleavouring to parry off the blows he rehim with, till in entercoming to parry off the blows he re-ceived one which nearly cut off his finger. He then per-teived it was a sword, and instantly knocked down his young and ferocious antagonist with a blow of his fist, when the sword flew out of his hand; his companions, who had been before cheering bin to the attack, all run away, and he was carried to the watch-house.

The constable of the night produced a sword, together with a pair of scarlet pantalcons, embroidered with white, a party coloured doublet of antique cut, a box of rouge, a feather, and several play-billst the whole of which curious articles the prisoner had with humat the time he attacked the com-

The magistrate questioned the prisoner as to his possession of these things. He replied that he had purchased the sword for his own use; and had that night been performing Rederick Dhe, in the "Lady of the Lake," at a private theater in the Westminster-road. He added, that the compatinant had first struck him, and he thought himself justific in using his weapon. 'in using his weapon.

The magistrate told him he was liable to be tried capitally under Lord Ellenborough's act for cutting and maining, upon which "Vich Alpine" hurst into tears, and said he would never do so again, if he could be forgiven.—Eventually he was ordered to stand committed for the simple assault,

Barn.—On Saturday evening as Mr. Vagg, Jun. and Mr. Marchant, were returning from our market, they were stopped and attacked by four footpads, who beat them severely with their bludgeons. Mr. Vagg, fortunately owing to the spiritedness of his horse escaped, but the villains beat Mr. Marchant so dreadfully as to endanger his life: they robbed him of sixteen shillings: his pocket-book he threw over a hedge, and it was found and returned to him on Sunday.

Bristol—On Friday last, two girls, residing in Thatched House-lane, who subsisted by prostitution, were found dead in their beds; one of them sitting upright, with her arms across her breast. The body of one of them was detained, hen going to be interred, for a debt to the abandoned lodged, and who went to a lodged, and who went to a how she should act; but during the absence the corpse was carried off by some young ten.

Colchester.—Visitof a Horse by a Veterinary Surgeon.

On Wednesday evening last, about six o'clock, a horse in harness, just returned from the country, started from the door of its owner, Mr. Roofe, of this town, at full speed up High-street, passing the Angel, on towards the top of the town. When near Mr. Wallis's, it got upon the flat pavement, upset an apple stall, and dashed the gig to atoms against the portico of the New Corn Exchange; continued its career with the shafts along the portico, crossed the top of North-hill in straight line, and came against the door of Mr. Baker, veterinary surgeon, which flew open, and, in a moment, the horse, shafts and all, went down the passage into the kitchen, to the great alarm of Mr. Baker's family. Fortunately, no one was hurt. A boy was thrown down, but received no injury.

Canlow, Dec. 9.—A few days ago, in making a new avenue at Garryhunden, the seat of Sir T. Butler, Bart. in this county, a human skeleton of uncommon size was dug up; there were several gold coins found along with it. About two years ago two other skeletons were found nearly in the same place.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

At the Middlesex Sessions on Monday, after the Grand Jury had reported the bills found by them, the Grand Jury had reported the bills found by them, the Foreman and another of the Jury discovered that their pockets had been turned inside out and the contents carried away. The hall through which they had to pass was full of officers. The Jury returned again to court, and reported the case to the Chairman, who informed them that all the protection that could be, was greated them by the great tables. was granted them by the great number of constables employed to preserve order. At the same time a horse of G. B. ## FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Paris, Dec. 16.—The correctional tribunal was again occupied yesterday (Friday) in the case of Sir Jan. Scrawfurd, charged with having, in certain competitions, printed and published, calumniated and defamed the Duke de Grammont and the Duke de Guiche.—The Baronet, having in his hand a large packet of papers, again urged a right to defend himself. On the remark of the President, that M. Dupin had been assigned at the preceding audience for the defence, he protested against the measure and withdrew.—M. Dupin declared, that the defendant had not furnished him with the necessary documents and instructions in the cause; and for this reason he could not take upon himself the arduous duty assigned to him at that moment.—M. M. Berryer and Charrier, Advocates for the noble prosecutors, addressed the Court against the Chevalier's proposition.—The Tri-bunal, after hearing the King's Advocate, relieved the accused from the exception which he had taken against accused from the exception which he had taken against the judgment of condemnation, and ordered that he should withdraw his case, reserving to the parties the right of appealing against the libels published and distributed since the preceding sentence.—Among the latter obnoxious publications is a memoir circulated to-day in profusion in the saloon of the Court by Mr. Manuel, Sir James Crawfurd's Secretary: the title of the libel is The Case of Sir James Crawfurd, published as a preliminary to the trial for bigamy, which he is about to institute against the soi disant Lady Crawfurd, Anjoustreet, No. 21, St. Honore."—Sir James, in stepping into his carriage, cried out Vive la Charte!

TRIAL FOR MOST HORRID MURDERS.

At Lyons, commenced on Monday, the 11th instant, before the Assize Court of the Rhone, the trial of Peter Stephen Ga-briel Lelievre, alias Chevalier, aged 35 years, a native of Ma-drid, Vice-President of the office of the Finances of the Prefecture of the Rhone.

The prisoner is charged—1st. With poisoning his three first wives. 2nd. With the murder of a child whom he had by the third. 3rd. With stealing another child whom he meant to substitute for his own with the more results of the child whom he meant to substitute for his own with the more results. the child; and 4th, With having a umed, at Lyons, the name of Peter Claud Chevalier—with having arrived in that city with of received and route forged by himself, in erassing the names which were originally inscribed, and in substituting those of Jean Louis Chevaller; and with several other forgeries in public. lic and authentic documents, by signing with these fictitious

Refore Chevalier contracted his first marriages at Lyons, he Hefore Chevalier contracted his first marriages at Lyons, he had been rejoined in the month of May, 1812, by a young woman, a native of Holland. They lived together for a short time. This young woman was handsome, and the widow of an officer, named Debiral. She was suddenly seized with an internal inflammation, which occasioned her the most excruciating pain, till death terminated her sufferings.—After the unitarity and of his mistress, and in the space of a few years. timely end of his mistress, and in the space of a few years, Chevalier contracted four successive marriages. He married first, Mary Desgranges, daughter of a gentleman of lantied property at St. Didier: the second wife, Margaret Plaard, whose mother resides at Lyons; the third was called Mary Riquet, her brothers and sisters are still living; and lastly, be married, for the fourth time, Benoiste Besson, his present wife, whose father is a land owner and merchant at Charlieu, department of the Loire. The four marriage contracts are all in the same form and tenor, and entitle the survivor to the joint property; a disposition of which the Chevaller was not tardy in availing himself.

The young woman, Desgranges, first wife of Chevalier, was of a strong constitution, and of excellent health. She presently complained of internal pains; her infant daughter was in the same condition. The child soon died of convulsions, and its mother speedily followed it to the grave. The prisoner, feeling no compunctions, married Margaret Pizard on the 25th Aug. 1816. She soon became pregnant. Her condition was attended with great pain and retchings. On the 18th of May in the following year, she was delivered of a boy, who received the name of Eugene; this is the child whom Chevalier was afterwards accused of murdering. In a month after delivery she was visited with fresh pains; and strong convulsions cause on in rapid succession. No nurse or attendant was assigned to on in rapid succession. No nurse or attendant was assigned to her—Chevalier would be alone. The malady continued to increase; the convulsions became more frequent; and Margaret Plzurd died on the 14th Sept 1817.—In June, 1818, the prisoher contracted a new marriage, with Mary Riquet. This third wife, before long, died a violent death. She became pregnant in her turn, and the moment of delivery was preceded, like the in her turn, and the moment of delivery was preceded, like the others, by extraordinary pains and strong convulsions. The woman Pontanier, the sick nume, was refused permission to attend Riquer; and this confirmed the name in her suspicion that poison had been administered. Her imagination was roused, and she reproached the accused with giving it. After a lapse of a few. days, the prisoner communicated to her with the utmost composure, the sudden death of his wife. Pontanier, terrified, fell into a passion, and told the prisoner that the family of Riquet were determined to have the body opened. They were, lowever, affaid that any proceedings would bring the pri-

most composure, the sudden death of his wife. Pontanier, terrifled, fell into a passion, and told the prisoner that the family of Riquet were determined to have the body opened. They were, however, afraid that any proceedings would bring the prisoner to the scaffold, and disgrace the children, without restoring the mother tolife. This double consideration restrained them.

The following are some fasts relating to the unfortunate woman:—The nurse never passed a single night with her charge; the prisoner strictly forbad her, happen what might. On one occasion he inadvertently left the nurse with his wife. When she returned to moisten the lips of the patient, who lay quite exhausted, in a state of perspiration, she surprised the prisoner, who was giving her something in a cup. She remarked that he did wfrong in foroing any thing down his wife's throat, who appeared to be in the last agonies. He then desisted, and put the cup on a chair. It contained a liquid like water. The nurse dipped her finger into it, and tasted it—it was an ardent spirit: then renewing her reproachful language to the prisones, she said "that is not what the doctors have ordered." In a few seconds afterwards, while pouring into the parched mouth of his wife the remainder of the portion, he said "be quiet, what I am giving to her is for the purpose of relieving her stomach; this will bring on a crisis, which will save or carry her off." Strong convulsions immediately ensued, and the putjent fell out of the bed; but the prisoner, with much sany-froid, raplaced her, and in a few minutes she expired in the greatest agony.—With respect to the murder which the prisoner is charged with having committed on the bedy of bis son, the mode placed ner, and in a few minutes are expired in the greatest agony.—With respect to the murder which the prisoner is charged with having committed on the body of his son, the mode in which he attempts to justify that atrocious net, leaves no room to doubt that he was the author of the child's death. He room to do not take the was the author of the that's each. I was to nurse at Villeurbanne; and that having taken him from themoe, he was going to put him to nurse at Pallionay, when he had the misfortune to see him expire in his arms.

In addition to which, the prisoper ventures to dictate, write, and sign the following, "That on the 3d of August, 1820, at seven in the evening, he crossed, with his child, the bridge of Guillotine, in returning from Villeurbanne, intending to place him with a new nurse. That instead of going to his apartments at Lyons, to sleep, he preferred passing the night at the Half Moon, on the road to Tassin. That put he pext day, the 3d of August, he set out for Pallionay, distant only two leagues. That he lost his way in a wood; that a branch wicke he could not avoid, struck his child on the head, and stunned him; that not observing a hollow at his foot, concealed under long grass. not observing a hollow at his foot, concealed under long grass, he stumbled; that the infant fell from his arms, down a precipice, and was dashed against the rocks; that stunned by the fall, and in despair, he became senseless; that all his researches for the child, as well as for extrication, proved fruitless; that overwhelmed with grief and despair, he returned to Lyon; finally, that on Sunday, the 7th of August, still entersaining the hope of recovering his child, he returned to the place where the accident happened, but his researches proved a second time useless."-In answer to this declaration, several contradictions are

The Cuurt having heard the whole of the evidence, pronounced a verdict of Guilty of murdering his wife, of stealing the child, and of various forgeries; and be was sentenced to VIENNA, Dec. 4 .- It is now quite decided that the conferences of Troppau, which, as the public have been already informed, are adjourned for three weeks, are to be continued here. We therefore expect, this week, the Ministers of France, Russia, Prussia, &c. back from Troppau. The Prussian Chancellor of State, Prince Hardenberg, and the Russian Secretary of State, Count Capo d'Istria, were likewise expected. Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress, as well as the Emperor of Russia; will arrive here about the 12th. It is not known whether the Emperor Alexander will make any stay here. It is said that the answer from Naples to the proposals last made, will decide on the re-opening of the Conferences. The two couriers who were dispatched on the 20th Nov. from Troppau, for Naples, and were undoubtedly the bearers of those proposals, may be expected, it is said, about the 12th or 13th of this month.

INDIAN AND COLONIAL.

" REPUBLIC OF HAYPI. "Proclamation to the People of the Army of the Artibonite and the North.

"JEAN PIERRE BOYER, PRESIDENT OF HAYTI. "Citizens! Soldiers!—The horrid despotism under which you have grouned these last fourteen years, and the misery you have undergone, appear to approach to their end. The first effort for your liberty is given you by St. Marcs, which has just ranged itself under the banner of the Republic. It was nothing, my dear country-men, to have fought the French, to acquire our national independence, if a wise organization and a well represented Government, had not come to assure not only for our present generation but to our children, the benefits of the church and the equality of rights; and in the end to guarantee a long existence to regenerated Hay-tians. It is for that object that the Representatives of the people are labouring, while General Christophe consulted nothing but his ambition and passions. He misused the authority which had vanquished our ancient tyrants, entered this town like a desperado, where were collected the Constitutional Assembly, and commenced a civil war because our Legislature had judged it necessary, to limit the magistrate's authority over the people. God has not permitted that this haughty man should succeed in his project—he was repelled in his attempt—the government of the Republic was organized from the Constitution, emanating from the general will. The laws are equally beneficial to all citizens, and have established its empire, and the State; a slow step, but a secure one, has constantly marched, since that period, towards its solidity and prosperity, whilst the phentom of power which General Christophe has usurped over you, has fallen by catastrophe. The iron rod which he held weighty over your heads, will now be broken in his own hands.—Citizens! Soldiers! I will not repeat to you all the horrors which the chief of the north or his agents have committed. They are repugnant to my, heart, and I hasten to drive them from my imagination; but I will recall to you this incontestible truth, When virtue is enlisted against vice, the triumph of the latter cannot be very lasting;' this is the will of the Most High.

"Like my predecessor, Alexander Petron, the founder of our Republic, I had always calculated, that with your aid we should one day break the iron yoke of the oppressor, who has so frequently violated personal rights and heaped accumulated misery on Hayti. Follow the example of the 8th Brigade and the garrison of St. Marcs. Follow those brave men. All the military men who may join the Republic, shall be amply rewarded. After this day of pain and sorrow, will succeed those of union and friendship.

Inhabitants of the Artibonite and of the north! Soldiers of all rank, my companions in arms, the Haytians can no longer have any disputes to cause the effusion of blood among themselves—let us thank the Al-mighty—Let us forget all that has passed, and be mindtul of the unfortunate. The republican army which you see at St. Marc, the commune of Berettes, the Cahos a Saint Raphael, a la Grand Riviere, is placed there solely for the purpose of maintaining the public tranquillity, and protecting your families, your fortunes, and your rights—It will violate none of your rights; and what it may take shall be scrupulously paid for.

Thus, my friends, unite in re-planting the tree of liberty, which has been torn down by your tyrants. Rally round it, and partake of all its enjoyments, but avoid all reproaches of your brethren. The republic requires no bloody conquests. It wants only those of the heart, and its kindest affections. If any one errs the laws will punish him. Forget, I say, once more, all that has past, and think only of the future. Come like children and enjoy the benefits of your laws.

"Vive la Republic of Hayti! Vive Independence! Vive a Liberty and Equality!—Given at the National Palace of St. Marc, 16th October, 1820—17th year of our Inde-

CAPE HENRY, Oct. 12. ed to learn that the Kingdom of Hayti is about to become a Republican Government, and to be conducted as in the time of Toussaint Louverture. This revolution has been meditated for some time, and it appears to have been well planned, and has succeeded without bloodshed. The King, some time ago, had an attack of apoplexy, and had not recovered from its effects when the commotions took place. The leaders took this advantage, as they knew well he was a man that, at the head of 500 men, would defeat as many thousands. His body-guards to the amount of 2,000 men, stuck by him for a few days; but he could not get them to march upon the Cape, although he promised them the pillage of it; and, finding himself deserted, he shot himself through the heart. It is computed that there are from forty to fifty millions of dollars in the citadel. The soldiers are all to have double pay; and there is a large sum to be put in immediate circula-ion. The new Constitution is not yet framed; but it is the general opinion that it will make this place much more important, and we ourselves are of the same way of thinking. The President is to be General Romaine, a very worthy man, and very popular; but there are likely, at the settling of a new Government, to be squabbles

CURACOA, OCT.16-" No doubt you have been informed ere this that a correspondence had taken place between the two opposing Chiefs, and it is reported an armistice has been agreed upon by General Bolivar for one month. General Morillo has arrived at Caraccas for the purpose of getting supplies, and has succeeded in procuring 3000 Independent army under the command of General Valdez has been defeated with a severe loss. It is said that three ships, direct from Hamburgh, are ex- | Jia 18, T. Bennett, Long-acre, Muldlesez, ironmonger. Dec.

pected at La Guayra without being obliged to touch at any of the Colonies, and that all friendly vessels belonging to European States will now be admitted into the ports on the Main. Bolivar, when he arrived at Turbaco, indicated pacific statements, which he promulgated in despatches sent by a flag of truce to the Carthagenian Government; the answers were dictated in terms of urbanity, but he soon evinced; by his invectives against the Spanish nation, that he was acting with the greatest duplicity towards the Royalists. Hechallenged the garrison of Carthagena, which sallied forth at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, on the 1st instant, and almost annihilated the Independents—only a few were enabled to escape.

Despatches have been received from New Columbia by the way of North America, containing details respecting the operations of the Independents in September and the beginning of October, in which it is acknow-ledged, that the forces under General Bolivar had been 30 much weakened by the successes of Gen. Morillo, that it was impossible that further attempts against the forces of the latter should at present be attended with success. The despatch from General Bolivar to General Morillo, requesting a suspension of hostilities, is dated St. Christobel, Sept. 24, 1820. He observes in it, that although the large armies of the Republic are sufficient to occupy the remaining part of Venezuela in the hands of the Royalists, and to extend its dominions to Quito, yet the great expences of the war occasion the country to suffer more than is necessary; desirous therefore to promote the felicity of the people, even at the cost of the Republic, and not being able at present to treat for their independence, he would make propositions at his head quarters, at St. Fernando de Apure, where he should be on the 23d Oct. but that the war should continue in the mean time.—General Morillo, in consequence of the receipt of this despatch, collected all the troops he was able, and calculated on meeting Bolivar before that period, and defeating his army.

GENERAL QUIROGA AND RIEGO.—General Quiroga has printed a letter, addressed to General Riego, in which, after saying that he accepts with pleasure the protestations of friendship which the latter bad made in his apology, he declares that there never existed any difference between them. Upon the dissolution of the army of the Isle of Leon, General Quiroga agreed with Riego in conceiving it to be an ill-timed measure; but he could not oppose it in his quality of a Deputy of the Cortes, inasmuch as it was not within the limits of the functions of that body, but within those of the Executive Power He finishes with expressing a wish to clasp Riego in his arms. From this letter it further appears, that the Revolutionists had appointed Quiroga General in-Chief of the Liberating Army, as far back as the month of November, 1819; but that, having been as rested in consequence of suspicions entertained of him by the Government, he had in the first instance experienced considerable difficulty in escaping from prison, and was afterwards delayed by the bad state of the roads; so that Riego had the honour of striking the first blow.

The English of William the Conqueror, substituted for the Saxon, Master.

Nearly all the colloquial, domestic, and cremonial and polite dislect of England is from the Norman of this date: the dialect of the country and of the fields continued after the Conquest, as is usual in such cases, Saxon, as before, and as it is still. Thus, the country hog became pork—the calf, veal—the ox, beef—and the sheep, mutton, &c.
&c. &c. It is the course of all languages, and the genius of the human expression, to express much of its meaning by obvious metaphor, describing things by their similars to raise or to depress, or to illustrate merely: CREATOR, Father—Protector, Father. To name Deity and Rulers by the same word, Allah, Ali; Friend, Brother. This simple habit of the early formation of language, always beautiful, pleasing, and instructive, while it is obvious and intelligible, has been the fruitful source of many errors, disputes, and false conclusions in the changes and corruptions in the orthography of written speech in after times; and Bentham has well said, through Dumont, "Metaphore n'est pas raison." Words and names are not the sure evidence of the truth or existence of things.

"Sir" is our abbreviation for the Norman word "Sire! there is no difference of meaning; the use of Sire has been a courtly affectation merely.

The Norman word "Sire" is retained in our address to royalty, as the relict of the same dialect is still preserved in our Courts of Law and other public assemblies. "Oyez," so often ludicrously pronounced O Yes! its proper sound, in three syllables, O-y-ez, is much preferable to the Saxon Words, "Hear, listen, or attend," which is its meaning, and for which it is used.

The interjections of repulsion, contempt, or command Tshu. have the same character of sound and expression, which is analogous to their use in the signification of dignity, authority, or superiority

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, DEC. 19.

Hunter, Esq. v. King.

This was an action against the defendant, charging him with gross neglect in a transaction which he had un-dertaken to negotiate for the plaintiff.

The plaintiff's case was conducted by Messrs. Scarlett and Espinasse, the defendants by Messrs. Denman and Hutchinson.

Mr. Scarlett's statement was this :- The defendant, Mr. King, lives at No. 8, John-street, Adelphi, and is an advertising money and annuity broker: Mr. Hunter possesses some fortune, and resides at the west end of the town. About December, 1818, this latter having some money vested in annuities, was introduced by Mr. Calendar to the defendant, as a person likely to be useful to him. He applied to Mr. King, and in some time had notice from him, that an annuity had been made out which would suit him. An annuity deed was then drawn up between a Mr. Tuffnell, of the County of Essex, and the plaintiff, the latter giving 400l. in cash for 70l. a-year, payable during the natural life of the said Tuffnell, to the plaintiff and his heirs. A warrant of attorney was also given, confessing a judgment in default of payment of the annuity; but in this, as well as in the deed, the name of Pike, a clergyman of Essex, and a man of a large fortune, was introduced, by way of additional security to the buyer for the payment of the annuity. It since turned out that Mr. Pike's name was forged to the warrant of attorney and deed, and Tuffnell being a man of no substance, had quitted the country. Only once half-year's annuity had been paid. Under these circumstances the plaintiff househ his cation assigns. cumstances, the plaintiff brought his action against Mr. King, alleging, that if he had used due precaution and taken ordinary pains, the plaintiff would not have been so imposed upon. But it was not pretended that he was a party to the forging Pike's name; on the contrary, the plaintiff's Counsel seemed to admit that he (King) had himself been imposed upon by Tuffnell, and indeed it was likely he had left to him the care of having Pike's signature put to the deed of warrant of attorney. In an agent, it was said to be a case of gross neglect, as Mr. King himself should have seen Pike execute the deed, and he was now answerable for its neglect.

Mr. M'Dougal, the plaintiff's Attorney, put in the deed and warrant of attorney.

Mr. Calendar was the person who introduced the plain-tiff to the defendant. The latter procures annuities for those who wish to purchase. Witness has himself done business with him.

The Rev. Mr. Pike denied that the signature to the deed was his hand-writing.

Charles George Parker has some knowledge of Tuffnell; he is out of the kingdom, and has left no property behind. Mr. M'Dougal again. The defendant, in a conversa-tion with witness, admitted his liability to the action, but said there was no use in suing him, as he was unable to

The deed was then read. It purported to guarantee the payment of 701, a year during Tuffnell's life, for a consideration of 4001, the seller bearing all the expences of conveyancing, &c. Mr. Denman took some technical objections to the declaration, which were overruled. The Learned Gentleman then addressed the Jury, contending that the plaintiff had not given evidence enough to fix the responsibility on the defendant.

Mr. Justice Holroyd (the Chief Justice had left the Court at one o'clock) told the Jury they must be satisfied that there was gross negligence in the case. Here the defendant did not seem to have taken due precaution.

The Jury found for the plaintiff damages 514l. and

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, DEC. 20

The Hope Assurance Company v. Magnay and Pickering. This was an action to recover from the defendants, who are extensive paper manufacturers, a sum exceeding 4,000l. alleged to have been obtained from the Hope Assurance Company under the fraudulent representation of the property of a person named Pymm, for the benefit of the said defendants.

Mr. Serjeant Lens said, that the only question which the Jury had to try was, whether the defendants were guilty of the fraudulent conduct imputed to them or not. He then detailed the evidence, and said, his only accusation against the defendants, was, that they lent their respectable names to the transaction, and made false representations of their circumstances in which Pymm was placed, and thereby made themselves responsible in the affair. When the fire had occurred, and when the amount of the policy was to be paid, they were most urgent to obtain payment for Pymm. The Learned Serjeant having made some further observations on the evidence to prove his case, proceeded to call his witnesse

The Vice-Chancellor's order directing this issue, was put in and read, as were the two policies effected by ymm in the Hope, the first bearing date the 21st. Feb. 1809, for the sum of 3,000l. on the stock and utensils of the mill at Exwick, 600l. on two houses, and 900l. on nine cottages. The second policy was dated the 13th Oct. and was for 750l. ou a building called a linney, and 750l, for the stock it contained.

Mr. Hodge, an officer of Excise in Devonshire, superintends the district in which Pymm's mills were situate, He first surveyed them on the 6th of July, 1809; at which time the whole stock charged was 208 reams. On the 19th Aug. there were 312 reams of the first class, and two of the second class. The duty, during that time, was 2491, and the quantity of paper which paid the duty was 860 reams of the first class, and two of the second class. On the 9th Oct. the quantity was 716 of the first class, and the duty was 249l. 15s. 9d. and the duty was 2491. 15s. 9d. On the 18th Nov. the stock amounted to 701 reams of the first class, and the duty to 2011. 6s. The fire happened on the 4th Dec. in which day the stock was 271 reams, first class. Witness was in the linney that morning, and thinks there was a little loose paper there, but none to take as stock. The mill was burnt down.

Dunsford and Mortram, in the employ of Pymm, proved the value of the property on the premises at the time of the fire.

Mr. Bury, Secretary to the Hope Office, stated, that on the Ist or 2d Feb. Mr. Magnay said to the witness that the Union had paid, but did not then name Mr. Pymm. On the 17th Jan. 1810, Mr. Magnay lodged an attachment in the office against Pymm's claim; but on the 1st Feb. this attachment was withdrawn. On the 22d Jan. 1810, Pymm's claim was laid before the Committee; but it was referred to a General Board on the 2d Feb. A letter was reserved to a General Board on the 2d Feb. A letter from Pymm was then produced, directing that the money should be paid into the house of Hoare, Barnett, and Co. Mr. Magnay suggested, that a draft for the sum should be given to witness, and that he, Mr. Magnay, would go with him to his solicitors, and take their advice. A bill on a stamp was drawn in the regular way, which hill arrived in due course, and was considered. way, which bill arrived in due course, and was paid on the 6th Feb. The policies were delivered up on the money being paid.—Mr. Davies, formerly a Director of the Hope, gave evidence nearly to the same effect.

Mr. Serjeant Lens informed his Lordship that he could carry the case no further: and he begged to declare that there was no ground for so doing.

Mr. Justice Park was of opinion the plaintiff's conduct was proper in stopping the proceedings; and he would add, that the defendants would go out of Court with characters unimpeached.

The Jury were of the same opinion with his Lordship, and a verdict was entered for the defendants.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, DUBLIN, DEC. 9.

Coila v. Richard M.Namara, Esq.
This was an action to recover damages (which were laid at 5,000l.) for a breach of promise of marriage. It was Jury. Mr. Wallace stated the plaintiff's case to the Jury; he described the plaintiff as a widow, when first she met the defendant "was," said the Learned Counsel, "if not in affluence, at least in easy circumstances; she was then beautiful, but the misery of five years has withered those charms that were then in all the bloom of loveliness. The first meeting of the plaintiff and defendant was in the year 1811; she was then in the prime of life, about twenty-four or twenty-five years of age; she had been a widow for two or three years, and was living with an infant daughter in a respectable part of London, and visited by persons of respectability. The defendant, I am sorry to say, is an Irishman, and, as far as the conduct of one individual can disgrace, he has deeply disgraced his country. The defendant was in London in the year 1811: he was then an adventurer—in common language a for-tune-hunter; he was also, Gentlemen, a Lieutenant in the Tower Hamlets Militia, with nothing beyond his pay; if poor, however, he had the true spirit of an adventurer —bold, ardent, and enterprising, seeking the means of living, and the gratification of his passions, without any sense of religion or morality, without even the soldier's religion—honour. Gentlemen, those are the persons be-tween whom you sit in judgment." Mr. W. then detailed the evidence in the case, and read extracts from two or three letters; in one the defendant, who was then at Bath, described his difficulties from the want of a pair of breeches, which were in pledge, and without which he could not come to town. In these letters he recognised the plaintiff as Mrs M'Namara. The principal witness to prove the plaintiff's case, was Caroline Exton, who stated that she lives in London; is in the service of Mrs. Coila, never was in a Court of Justice before; knew the plaintiff twelve years; lived with Mr. and Mrs. Coila, at No. 63, George-street, Portman-squares Mr. Coila died in 1809; was a gentleman of fortune (here the certificate of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Coda was produced to the witness, who proved that she had it from the clergyman at St. George's Church, Hanover-square, and that she compared it with the original in the book); her mistress's maiden name was Buxton; had a neat private house, elegantly furnished; was visited by most respectable friends and connexions: after the decease of Mr. Coila, the same friends continued to associate with her mistress had one child, a daughter, by her husband; the child died in 1814, aged eight years; her mistress resided six months after the decease of her 'kusband in the same house; she then took another house in the same street, No. 32, Upper George-street; let her house to a family; it was elegantly furnished; the furniture cost between fourteen and fifteen hundred pounds; resided with her mistress since the death of her husband; saw the defendant, first time, in 1811; he made many visits; was introduced to her mistress by a lady, a friend of his; was not always admitted by the plaintiff; was always attentive to her mistress; he was particularly attentive to her in March 1812; the defendant told her (witness) he was married to her mistress, but conjured her to keep it secret: was in April 1812. The defendant at the resided at Deptford with his regiment, the 2d Tower Hamlets; from thence he removed to Hackney with his regiment; her mistress let her house to the Earl and Countess of Roden for the season; her mistress returned to the house with Mr. M'Namara; could not say how long he remained, as he frequently went back and forward to his regiment: her mistress left England with the defendant to go to France; in a short time she returned, when her child died. After the defendant's return, he was fearful of arrest, being obliged to absent himself from the regiment at Deptford; he remained concealed at Lewis

ham, a short distance from that town; her mistress had plate, when the defendant returned from the Continent; he had some of it under his charge; he got money on it, and said it was the want of money made him do it; the defendant left England in 1815, for Ireland: was predefendant left England in 1815, for Ireland: was pre-sent when he set out on his journey; previous to his go-ing he gave her mistress a paper (here the certificate be-fore read was handed to the witness, who fully proved it to be the hand-writing of the defendant), and said he meant to fulfil his engagement towards her, in order to put her out of all power of fretting; this occurred on the morning of his departure; was present in the room when the certificate was written by the defendant; was desired by the defendant to put her name to it as a witness, which she accordingly did; nothing further occurred; the defendant went out of town to join his regiment. In December, 1816, the defendant returned from Ireland, and remained at the house of her mistress till June 1817; the defendant had a very severe fit of illness; was confined near three months; heard him say, that only for the kind and good attention of her mistress he could not possibly recover, as he did; the defendant was attended by eminent physicians during his illness; when her mistress first saw Mr. M. Namara, she appeared to be about 26 years of age; they resided together, and she conducted herself as a wife should do; never heard the slightest blemish on her character; she was always addressed as Mrs. M'Namara.

Here a Juryman asked the witness was her mistress always addressed by her friends as Mrs. M'Namara? The witness replied, she was always addressed by that title by those friends who visited her, but that in consequence of the desire of Mr. M. Namara, the visits of many friends were dispensed with. He: mistress resumed the name of Coila, when Mr. M. Namara left her in 1817.

Here ten letters from the defendant to the plaintiff were produced, all of which the witness proved to be in his hand-writing.

This was the case against the plaintiff.—The Jury gave a verdict with 2,000l. damages.

LIE EXTRAORDINARY—"The Cameleon, Captain Mingay, sailed from Woolwich on Tuesday, with a pre-clous cargo on board, consisting of Madame De Mont, soi-disant Countess of Colombier, Theodore Majocchi, and several other foreigners of the same rank and character. The Cameleon proceeds to the Mediterranean, and will land the cargo on the coast of Italy. Thus these wretches have a King's ship to carry them home, while the Queen, of England was left to make her way to England in a common packet-boat? The Cameleon was one of the little squadron attendant upon the King on his late aquatic excursions."—Times, Chronicle, &c.

A Lie in every point and particular, except that the Cameleon, Captain Mingay, one of the vessels of the squadron on the Portsmouth station, lately arrived at and sailed from, Woolwich. All the rest is a shear fabri-

The Cameleon has been employed, at the request of the Board of Longitude, in bringing from France to the Observatory at Greenwich, a fine Chronometer, lately made by Brequé, for that Board. The vessel was simply used for that purpose, which, having fulfilled, she is now returned to her station at Portsmouth!

"In consequence of the report inserted in most of the Newspapers of yesterday, that among the addresses presented to the Queen on the preceding day, there was one from The Highland Society of London, presented by a Deputation, in the Highland Society of London has not voted or presented any Address to her Majesty; and as the report, attempting to connect the Address and Deputation in question, with the name of that Society, appeared to have proceeded from intentional misrepresentation. have proceeded from intentional misrepresentation, I cannot doubt your readiness to aid in laying before the public a correct statement of the facts. The Highland Society of London is incorporated by Parliament for purposes entirely unconnected with the expression of any political feelings or opinions; and, in point of fact, political discussions are never admitted in the Society. The propriety of this regulation must be obvious when I state, that the society comprises, in the list of its members, a great majority of all the men of rank, property, and respectability connected with the Highlands of Scotland, and necessarily includes many distinguished individuals opposed to each other in political opinions, though they unite in promoting the patriotic and benevolent objects of this institution. The Highland Society of London has not voted or presented any address to the Queen; meither has it interfered or given any opinion on the sub-ject of the proceedings against her Majesty; and the persons who have attempted to give a fictitious impor-tance to their own address and deputation, by assuming the name of the Society, have practised upon the public a deception which deserves to be exposed."---Morning

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We return our thanks to the writers of the two abusive Letters we have received. If we did not make rogues angry our purpose would not be answered.

We thank our Norfolk friend for his hints, but we do not need them.

The Sorngg's Purity List shall be analized, and the virtue of the Queen's partizons considered in'all quarters.

We shall shew up Mr. Lechmere Charlton, as a Five Guinea Subscriber, and the Cause of Purity next Sunday. We cannot conceive how men can be such blockheads as to provoke exposures of this kind.

We have received the Letter of Amicus, for which we are much obliged.

Ladrone, on the subject of James Brougham, is under consideration.

As if His Majesty could be kept in the dark about what she has been doing for the last twenty years; or as if ony fact of the sort could stand between her and her right, if she had any. We never should have noticed her, if she had not thrust herself forward by patronizing public places, and endeavouring to play off Honnes in state: but now that she has sent a man to bully us, we have no hesitation in calling the attention of the Legislature to her assumption of Royal Honours, and shall amuse our Readers next week with some comical stories of Her Highness and Alderman Wood.

JOHN BULL.

LONDON, DEC. 21.

WE have launched our bark, and the tide of publie favour is with us, decidedly with us. We reicice sincerely, as it may be believed, in the unprecedented success of this Paper-ours, however, is not the satisfaction of hirelings, who delight in the sight of the pounds, shillings and pence with which they are to be paid for their labours :- the pleasure we feel arises from the proof which the extraordinary and increasing demand for JOHN BULL gives us of the feelings of the country. It is unparalleled in Newspapor History, that a Sunday paper should have gone on through the whole week increasing its sale, and should have sold to Loyalty on the last day, when its principles were known, more than curiosity would purchase, when its course was doubtful. We are professedly and arowedly

LOYALISTS AND ROYALISTS, and apon the faith of that profession build our claim to the support of all who think with us; and we glory in saying that the experiment approves the theory, and that both theory and experiment prove the important, the gratifying fact, that the immense majority of the public are with us, Loyalists and ROYALISTS!

It is by the power which that support will give us that we shall be enabled to disseminate TRUTH over the face of the empire—to open the eyes of the deceived, and to satisfy the minds of the doubtful. We will shew our countrymen what the Faction is by which we are agitated and disturbed—we will give them TRUTH while we expose falsehood, Scurrility and invective, treason and blasphemy are the weapons which have for a length of time been wielded against our most sacred institutions. The retainers who are employed to fight the fight are far below our mark:—the leaders, the plotters, the hidden directors of this despoiling warfare, are our game :-we will put them up: aye, and please God! knock them over afterwards.

In the pursuit of this object, melancholy as is the truth, true it is that the Queen first presents herself to our notice. She is as much the leader of the radicals as Hunt was before her. He had his procession and subscription: she has had hers. Mr. Hob-house praised Hunt—Mr. Hobhouse praises the Queen: Major General Wilson served under Hunt: -he is equally devoted to the Queen: Little Waddington was the harbinger of Hunt-Little Wadington marched before the Queen in her first day's progress to the House of Lords; in short, the object, the votaries, and the measures are the same? and the personage who claims to be recognised as Queen Consort of these realms, has accepted an office vacant by the imprisonment of her predecessor in lichester

These spouting, mouthing, blind devotees to dis-order and riot, care as little for the Queen as they did for Hunt. She serves as the pole to hoist the revolutionary Cap of Liberty on. Burdett was the pole at one time; Wardle at another; that wretched animal Paul at a third; Hunt was the last pole before the Queen; and now Her Majesty is established the veritable Mother Red-Cap of the faction.

She is a facetious personage, and so is that smirking blockhoad Wood. The Leicestershire Militia Address was a very good Hoax, but not a comical one; the dressing up of the sham Highlanders, however has had a very capital effect: we refer our readers to a statement made, not in the Post, or the Courter, or any paper whose crime is byulty, but in the Morning Caronicle. Lord Erskine is a Scotsman, and (if we can credit the report of a birth so obscure) so is Perry: and with all their anxiety to holster up Mother Red-Cap, they could not allow the sacred tartan to be sullied silently. But to have seen the Brandenburgh Court gravely listening to the Galic Address, and Wood answering it, must have been charming: it was altogether the vest excuse for seeing twenty or thirty men sans ctiquette, ct sans culoites, we have ever met with.

The Queen is by law as yet Queen of Eag-land—by disposition Queen of Hoaxers; and the history of her hoaxes, which the Misses Walter have begun in the Times, shall be continued till we promise the Queen, that she shall curse the Times and the hoaxers too. The Bayswater laundry hoax, will be the first we display to the world. The Marionetti balancé hoax, the next. Monk Lewis's nursery garden hoax, the third. Lord Henry Fitzgerald's extraordinary droll hour, the fourth; and so we shall go on, pledging ourselves to exaggerate nothing, but to state plain facts, which shall be corroborated not by witnesses from Como, Pesaro, or Milan, respectable as they may be, but by people of rank, character, and consequence, all tangible, very tangible, particularly the Ladies, and all living within the bills of mortality at this moment.

We now turn for a moment to the majority of the Common Council of London, who voted Mr. Brougham the freedom of the city, as a manifestation of their sense of his integrity, &c. in the Queen's affair. That the majority of the Common Council are blockheads, is not their fault, but their misfortune; but that having eyes and ears, they should be blind and deaf, does seem a little extraordinary.

We wrote a letter to Mr. Henry Brougham, and inserted it in our last Paper. We have sent a copy of it, but we have received no answer:—this Mr. Henry Brougham may call contempt. If Mr. Henry Brougham chooses to ride the high horse with us—well and good; his tumble will be eventually the greater. However, as he does not choose to reply, we will take the liberty to state to the preeminent dunces of Guildhall, that Mr. Brougham did, when the Queen appointed him Attorney-General, offer to abandon her cause, and to refuse the appointment, if the King's Government would make it worth his while. This we positively assert: and now, lest the wiseacres should think to get out of their scrape, by saying that they conferred their freedom upon him, to mark their approbation of his private friendship for the Queen, we take leave to say, thut Mr. Brougham has declared in company that his wife never has visited the Queen, and never shall! Thus Mr. Brougham offered to give up the Queen for a silk gown of his own, but he declines that his wife's silk gown shall be spoiled by the association: considering what we have stated of the advertisements of Mrs. Brougham's marriage and accoucliment, this reserve seems over nice.

Let us see if Mr. Brougham will contradict this. Were it possible for the Common Council of London to be made more ridiculous than they were: such a thick-headed blunder might be mortifying to them: but as they were, previous to this stupid affair, below the reach of ridicule, so they are now spared any additional degradation.

Mr. Canning has resigned,—we regret the loss of his eminent abilities, and we confess that we do not see why, agreeing as he did in all the original measures relative to the Queen, he should at this moment have found his situation untenable; but there is in the hearts of Englishmen such a true and natural regard for private friendship and personal feelings, that we submit without complaint, though not without reluctance, to Mr. Canning's temporary retirement from public life. It has been stated that Mr. Peel is to be his successor; and the premature rancour of Miss Walters' Newspaper, the Times, has already began with the usual foresight of malignity, to abuse Mr. Peel, as if he were already a Minister. It is well known that, to any man who is fool enough to love patronage and political power, the place of Secretary for Ireland is the most agreeable in his Majesty's gift: this place Mr. Peel occupied with unprecedented approbation: we have heard that he for the last years held it reluctantly, but at the earnest desire of his politi-cal friends. We do not therefore suspect Mr. Peel of any personal desire for office, and if he should be induced to take a share in the Government, we are convinced he will do so under the same feelings which induce His Majesry's Ministers to hold their places; namely, a strong feeling of public principle, and a strong sense of public duty, which admonish them that these are times, in which private case and domestic comforts ought to be sacrificed to the service of the Kine and of the Country, and the prevation of the Church and Constitution.

His Majesty Louis XVIII. on Tuesday, opened the Session of the Chambers. The ceremony took place in one of the Halls of the Louvre. The King delivered a speech, which was received with acclamations of "Vive le Roi."—At the close, the Minister of the Interior invited such of the newlyelected Deputies as were present, to take the usual oath, which was done in the prescribed form. His Majesty then returned to the Tuilleries amidst the congratulations of the assembled throng.

LIES.

Mr. Canning is going out to succeed Lord Stewart, who is coming home."—Times, Chronicle, &c. A lie.-Mr. Canning is not going to succeed Lord Stewart; nor is Lord Stewart coming home.

"Prince Leopold has purchased an estate from Dr. Anderson, in the neighbourhood of Claremont, as a residence for the Duchess chase is said to be about 15,0001.; it comprises an excellent house, and 150 acres of land."-

Times, Dec. 16. -Very minutely described-but a lie, notwithstanding. -Vide the Times of the 18th inst .- " There is NO TRUTH in the statement relative to the purchase of an estate in the neighbourhood of Claremont for the Duchess of Kent.'

MISTAKES.

"The Times, speaking of the Queen, says, though unattended with regal guards, though unblessed by the formal prayers of the church, she dwells in the hearts and is hallowed by the prayers of the people of England, who will with us rejoice to hear that her Majesty has utterly destroyed the aërial fabric of ministerial expectation, by renewing the term for which she originally took Brandenburgh House. The consternation produced by this news among Ministers may be readily conceived: and they must now set themselves in good earnest to provide for her Majesty a Palace suitable to her high birth and present rank.

This is clearly a mistake. Had the Queen not renewed the term (as they phrase it) of Brandenburgh House, Ministers might have had some reason for setting themselves to provide another dwelling for her, but since she has taken a fresh lease of her present residence, she has proved to the world how completely satisfied she is with it.

THEATRES.

Light are the critic's labours in these days of dull--There really is nothing to notice. member when, long before the close of December, we should have had a play from Reynolds, with all its varieties of sighing Emilies, old half-pay officers, citizens in brown wigs, with maiden sisters in powdered ones, mixed up with benevolent baronets scattering their bank-notes, and eventually rescuing heroines from the villainous designs of ravenous lords. That is to say, we should have had a great deal of amusement and the pleasant task of praising the author afterwards; while the proprietor would have had his house filled with laughing andiences, and his treasury with plenty of cash.—We are of a way of thinking to hold farce-writing in much higher esti-mation than most people. If there he not some par-ticular talent required for farce-writing, why have we at this moment no man who can; or, if he can, no man who does write a farce? In short, why have we nobody to succeed Reynolds? For though grave censors (the King of Cockayne, and the like of him) call Reynolds's comedies five act farces, we have had nothing since their day half so amusing, except, indeed, some of the new tragedies.

That good farces are not sometimes produced we do not presume to assert. A Roland for an Oliver is a good farce; but it is French, and a compound of three French pieces; yet, even in that, ably adapted us it is to our stage, there is none of the sharply hitoff characters of Foote, or the extraordinary whim of O'Keefe. Col.nan's Review stands as a proof that we have a farce writer still alive; but he is "A beef-eater now," and we have no farther hopes of him. The Jew and the Doctor is by another living author; and Raising the Wind by a third; but whether these persons wear out their wit, or what it is, we know not; there is at all events, a sad dearth of humourous talent at

One reason why we are inclined to maintain, the difficulty of writing farces, and the rarity of the genius necessary for it, is, that we have plenty of tragedies, all much about equally good and equally successful. Charles Kemble and Macready act them up, and, aided by occasional processions, and the production of banners and trophies, a new play lingers on its five or six nights, and then is gathered to the tomb of the Capulets.

The relative difference between a good farce and a mawkish tragedy is much the same as that between two glasses of sparkling champagne and five pints of thin milk and water. Then as to the acting of tragedy, there is no pleasure in seeing a tragedy acted unequally; and it must be confessed that, with the exception of Mrs. Faucit (who is always respectable). we have not a decent tragic actress on the stage.

It may seem ungrateful to the tragedians we have above-mentioned, to say that, which we are going to say; but we are quite sure, that if, in retrenching the over-swoln expences of the theatre, at a time when the principal attraction of tragedy, a Heroine, is wanting, Mr. Harris were to get rid of all his tragic actors, he would relieve himself from a very heavy charge, and lose nothing but the expence of keeping

On the other hand, what an excellent set of comic performers they have. Fawcett, Blanchard (who, since poor Munden's death, is our best old man); Liston, the inimitable; Jones and Emery; Mrs. Davenport; our favourite Gibbs: and in opera, Miss Stephens and Miss Tree. Thus it is we have plenty of dunces to write tragedies, and nobody to act them: we have plenty of actors to play farces, and nobody to write them."

We observe with dissatisfaction that Miss Stephens does not play before Christmas—this looks like affectation; for why her talents should not be made available in October and November, we who pay the same price for admission in winter as in spring, do not see: besides which, Miss Tree has been delighting us all the early part of the season with the most perfect willingness and good nature : she is, perhaps, the greatest acquisition the theatre has made for many years: putting together her interesting appearance, her beautiful figure, her naiveté. her sweet voice, and her striking turn for acting, we have nothing like her. We trust that she will soon be able to delight us again: her indisposition is a sad affair for the theatre.

A pantomime, upon the subject of Friar Bacon, will be produced on Tuesday, of which we need only say that Grimaldi is the clown. We envy the young ladies and gentlemen who will be witnesses of the performance.

Since writing the above our printer informs us that Mr. Munden is still alive: we beg pardon for our mistake : he is at Drury-lane,

All the Minor Theatres are brushing up for the holidays. The East London Theatre astonishes the Minories and Wapping. The Regency Theatre in Tottenham-street, turns itself into a West London Theatre to delight the inhabitants of Clipstone and Howland streets; and the Lyceum puts forth a performance called, "Soirces Amusantes, or something not dramatic but very new." If there are any "Soirces Amusantes" at this place without Mathews it will be something very new indeed.

MR. PETER MOORE.

We gave a place to a letter in our last Number, the object of which was an enquiry after one Peter Moore, in hopes, that some of our readers might have been able to satisfy our correspondent Mr. Price Evans on the subject better than us.

We confess we do not see the aim of Mr. Evans's question—even at Llangolien, whence he writes. Every body must know that Mr. Peter Moore, the present member for Coventry, was in the service of the rox family; but we are yet to learn what stigma can be thrown upon a man for the humility of his early pretensions; indeed, his elevation appears to us a most honourable mark of his abilities. His Excellency Bartolomeo Baron Pergami, G. M. S. C. it is known rose from a menial station much more rapidly, and his exaltations are much greater, but his claims were light, compared with those of the member for Coventry: Pergami made member for Coventry, was in the service of the Fox with those of the member for Coventry; Pergami made his way by that all commanding "os humerosque" charm, personal beauty, and every one knows that the love which it inspires (as Fielding says)-

" And bids the brawny Porter walk up shairs,"

But when we look at Mr. Peter Moore, and see not only that nature has done nothing for him in the way of good looks, but that his language is vulger, and his manners coarse, we are the more convinced that there is in him some powerful intellectual force by which he has over-come all difficulties, surmounted all obstacles, and placed himself where he is.

That we, have never been able to discover in what his merit consists, is attributable to our blindness—we are, however, most anxious to allow him full credit for all the talent we have ever discerned in him.

SIR-I have the pleasure to move in a very pretty circle of acquaintance, in the city, and have the greater pleasure to be very popular with the ladies, from a knack I have of remembering riddles, rebusses, charades, and nave of rememoering ricales, recusses, characes, and conundrums; and I piqued myself on two or three, which I had learned very ingeniously, when, the night before last, being out in company, a Miss. Humphries, a great gawky girl, just come from school, turned to and laughed at me, and called me a great booby for dealing out single conundrums as rarities, and slapped out at least fifty, with their answers, as fast as fast could be.

I collected myself, and listened, and was able to bring I collected myself, and listened, and was sofe to bring off a few, which follow. ## ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE:

TO THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE.

My LORD,—In my former Letter I attempted to prove, that from a peculiar conjuncture of times and circumstances, your Lordship might have seceded from the shallow and mischievous policy of modern whiggism with benefit to your character, and certainly without the surrender of your consistency. The high and unequivocal example of my Lord Grenville would have been a sufficient guarantee for your honour, and a pledge of your sincerity; but your Lordship had not the courage to follow it.

To acknowledge error is, no doubt, a sacrifice unwillingly made-by an ambitious statesman—perhaps it can only be made without hazard by a great one: still your Lordship might have perceived, without an extraordinary effort, that personal hostility against the Sovereign, though sanctioned by the precedent of republican independents, for the purpose of undermining the church and state, is not to be found in the creed of the Whigs, who rallied and combined to save and perpetuate both. Your Lordship might have calculated upon the support of the honourable part of the nation, in tempering the aristocratic republicanism of your friend Lord Grey, with the appearance at least of a constitutional bias; but you had not strength of mind to relinquish the vain hope of conciliating and sharing with the radical orators and the jacobins, the suffrages of the Common Council, and the claims of a misguided mob. Your Lordship might have learned a lesson from an indiscreet partizan, who, without claim to public attention beyond the rank and title he is arming the multitude to degrade, has gone out of his way to shew that the Whigs (if the name must follow the shade, stans nominis umbra) are without power or influence in the country. The silly boy did not perceive the extent of this admission; but your Lordship, with the advantage of years, cannot be ignorant of the cause of your degradation; and why a name, which at one time was sufficient to rally round it the best energies of the country, is so lamentably fallen in the public estimation, that it would be difficult to say whether the accession of the Whigs to power would be regarded most as a misfortune or a disgrace both to the monarch and the people.

Twice, only, within the last forty years has the golden opportunity been within your grasp by the misfortunes of your country; and, after a short, feverish and inglorious experiment of power, have you been driven with ignominy from your elevation, afferding the most curious political phenomenon recorded in the history of nations, in the union of the people with the monarch against the unconstitutional encroachments of his ministers. The unfortunate, but natural, inference, you, my Lord, and your party, have drawn from ex-perience, that the misfortunes of your country alone are capable of affording you the sweets of power, bea given a tone and colour to your policy, which, whilst a British heart throbs in the right place, must for ever preclude you from it. From the defeat of the oligarchy of 1783, by Mr. Pitt, the object of a constitutional opposition to the ministry of the day has been merged in an unblushing and systematic hostility to the essential interests of the country. During the whole of the revolutionary war, sustained by the opinion, and supported by the sacrifices, of the great body of the nation, to keep from our hallowed institutions the descrating hand of jacobinism and infidelity, the Whigs, my Lord, were consistent and persevering only in affording facilities to those who, from without or within, approached in hostility against them. Citizen Grey (now an earl, Heaven only and himself, his own creator, knows why) was the Coryphous of the band, the hardy expounder of the portentously nebulous system of Major Cartwright, and the architype of the Hunts and Hobhouses, as Baillie and Mirabean were of Danton and Robespierre!

In the volume of our victories, the mighty atchievements of the mightiest names in the annals of the country, your Lordship, and your friends, failed not to register your blackening protests; and when you found yourselves unable to support your calumpious opposition by argument as legislators, you resorted to the external aid of hired satirists and pensioned libellers, to supply the defect which was yet wanting to your purpose. Your official journal was never more happy in its lyrical effusions than when all the talents were put in requisition; and the wit of the Whigs was clubbed to ransack palaces for scandal, and to give to the world its namby-pamby satires upon the gallant Baron of Douro!!

Your precious example, my Lord, is honoured by the Hunts and Hones, who yet refuse you the credit of the invention; for they trace back great precedents cence in the reign of the first Charles, with a consistency, my Lord, that would of itself sufficiently mark the origin and character of your patriotic opposition.

You were equally the panegyrists of the bloody and proscriptive tyranny of a regicide republic, and of the monster to which, in its terrific and convulsive throes, it gave birth in the person of a military usurper. The vituperative and libellous attacks upon the Sovereign of England, were only returned by fulsome panegyrics on a powerful and unprincipled tyrant; who, more honest than a traitor in the bowels of our own country, avowed his object, and pointed to our overthrow and subjugation as the primary object of his ambition and his hopes! In proportion as he magnified and exaggerated his resources, you, my Lord, and your colleagues, laboured to depreciate those of your own country: in the ratio of his threats and denunciations, were your declarations of our imbecility and incapacity to resist them. The country has not forgotten, nor ever will forget, the prognostics of ruin and desolation uttered by your party, my Lord, up to the hour when the resistless Wellington had raised his arm to inflict the death-blow upon the idol of your worship and the despot of Europe; even when sedition stalked through the land at noon-day, and mutiny shook the foundation of our glory, you offered no helping hand; but when you beheld the citadel all but betrayed, deprecated those restraining laws, which alone could have averted the impending destruction. This, my Lord, was verily sympathising with the regicides! When the streets of Paris were deluged with the blood of the miserable victims of the 2d and 3d of September, Tallien opposed the introduction in the Convention of any measures to punish or to prevent assassination.—" The existing laws," exclaimed he, "against assassination are sufficient for the safety of the citizens, and I therefore move the order of the day.

Your Lordship will perceive, that these few words embrace the whole argument on which the Whigs have sustained their opposition to those measures which have hitherto kept the flood-gates of anarchy and insurrection closed around us! Frustrated in your hopes of national degradation, or, at least, of that degree of disaster at which desperation admits not a rejection of any means of redemption, you beheld your country, so long consigned, by your predictions, to infamy and subjugation, rise more powerful and glorious than ever, and, after settling the peace of Europe, become the arbitress of her destiny. It ras then, my Lord, that disappointment rendered the Whigs desperate, and threw open their arms to those who, equally hostile to the true interests of the country, look to the plunder of the state rather than to the enjoyment of office. You would have fraternized with them after they had told you their object-you coquetted with them even when they contemned your addresses. Then it was, my Lord, that your degradation was complete. Then it was that you discovered that all your sacrifices of principle—all your revolutionary incitements, and condescension to the most disgusting arts of popularity, recoiled upon yourselves, instead of displacing your opponents. The radical party availed themselves of your desponding views-the calumnies against government and the charges of corruption against ministers; but they received them, not as the contribution of partizans, but as confessions of a faction inculpated in the guilt which they betrayed. You succeeded in giving popular currency to a cry against government; but the cry was easily made to embrace the expectants as well as the possessors of power!

Limited in all your policy to the narrow sectaian views of party, you had not perspective wisdom enough to discern, that in labouring to stigmatize our institutions, and impute corruption to our public men, you yourselves might be involved in the sweeping denunciation, and the constitution, not the administration alone, be brought into jeopardy. I am not vapouring, my Lord: the fact is unquestionable; and I venture to affirm, and challenge proof to the contrary, that at no period, the most tumultuous, the most abandoned to licentious excesses, the most hostile to public men of every description, have ministers been so unpopular, with all the responsibility of public measures accumulated upon them, as your party, my Lord, the Whigs, who have had nothing to do but to practise the arts and solicit, by the mo ns, the suffrages of tion of your humbly tendered services on the Hustings in Palace Yard, or the later disgraces at York, but must feel the force and justice of the charge I have ventured to bring forward? Who that observes the scouts of the faction, availing themselves of the temporary alliance of the great mob leader, and usurping his office; who that has eyes and beholds to the still more pre-eminent period of popular li- the alternation of duties on the opposition benches, whom her hand was engaged) when she accepted and at the corners of the streets, but must the conviction of what is intended, and what is anticipated? Will you, my Lord, if you feel the charge to be a strong one, will you, or my Lord Grey, or Grosvenor, or Erskine, dare to disclaim your connection with the Moores, the Hobbonses, the Whitbreads, and the Wilsons? And if you dare not, my Lord, do you imagine we can separate them from the Woods, Waithmans, Hones, and Hunts, whose very puppets and agents they have shewn themselves to be?—I have the honour to be, my Lord, yours, FITZ HARDING.

ANALYSIS OF THE QUEEN'S FEMALE VISITORS. (No. 2.)

Wz copy from the Courier a list of the Queen's female. visitors, with some prefatory remarks made by the Editor of that Paper.
"Female character is so essentially the ground-work of all private happiness, and all social order, that we intend to departicular care and attention to this article.

"If the Ladies of England recognise, by their society, the purity of the Queen, our list will do her and them justice. If the Ladies of England shrink back from the Queen's society, and that only a few of looser morals, or with personal intersets. are found to visit her-then, again, our list will do justice to ber and to them.

"On so very delicate and pairful a subject, we trust we shall pursue the justest course, by inserting no name on the Queen's list which has not appeared in the Times on the Morning Chronicle, and shall give the greatest care to this list, as well to insert in it all qualified candidates, as to hasten to remove from it, as we have already done in more than one instance, Ladies who have complained, with a just indignation, of the insult and injury offered to their names.

"We shall repeat the list from day to day, and carefully note the new comers, in order that the whole truth of the case may be kept constantly before the public eye.

Who delayed her visit to the Queen so long and paid it at last with so bad a grace, that we shall content ourselves with the mere relation of the particulars of that visit, which will render any personal observations on her Ladyship unnecessary; we are always happy when we can do justice with the least possible degree of exposure.

Every body knows that Lady Jersey is the keenest female partizan in England, and her delay in visiting the Queon threw doubt and suspicion into the ranks of the Whigs to obviate which, it is said, it was thought necessary by their Cabinet that her Ladyship should forthwith make such visit -a proposition rendered somewhat palatable to her by the opposition of Lord Jersey. She, however, devised an ingenious expedient by which she might contrive all at once to vex his Lordship—pay her visit—and save her character. A watch was set upon the Queen, and one day when it was ascertained that her Majesty was safely engaged with her bottle of Madeira, in Tyrwhitt's room, at the House of Lords, so that her early return could not be anticipated, Lady Jersey, drove off full speed for Brandenburgh House, where one of her footmen wrote her name on the first leaf of her Majesty's visiting book -A LEAF WHICH HAS NOT YET BEEN TURNED!

Mrs. Hume.

Poor. Mrs. Hume, is too insignificant even to laugh at. She was a Brunswick-square fortune, at her last, prayers for a husband, when she fell in with Mr. for the sake of the gilding The greatest proof of her had taste is marrying him.

Lady Ossulston Wife of the silly little Lord of that name—is a French woman. We decline meddling with the prejudices of foreigners.

The Duchess of Bedford Is a Lady of the most refined sensibility. She was in mourning for the late Duke of Bedford (te the offer of his brother. In this, however, let the world think as they may, there was no inconsistency; the young Lady had vowed unto herself and mother that she would be married to a Duke of Bedford; and if the mortality had spread in the family, her Ladyship would probably have transferred her affections to all the branches of the illustrious House of Russel, till she had found one.

The Duchess of Leinster. Acting under the controul of her hasband, has been dragged to Brandenburgh House, and gone the fearful longth of dining there.

The only excuse (we are particularly anxious to find one) for his Grace's conduct, is the friendship of the Queen, for his uncle Lord Henry Fitzgerald (of which we shall shortly give an interesting history colleted in other days by the late Monk Lewis.) This sentiment of course is paramount with his Grace, to that of gratitude, which one might have thought he would have felt for the King, who in his beneficence and mercy reversed the attainder of his other uncle's rebel blood, which till it so pleased His Majesty to do, remained as a bar to shut his Grace's nephews and nieces from the participation of the common rights of the subject and stamped them as outcasts from society.

HIGHLAND ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN.

We beg the attention of our readers to an account of the Highland procession and Address, which we copy from the Times, at a loss which to admire most, the force of the description, the beauty of the language, or the purity of the sentiment. We shall illustrate it here and there with a remark or two.

"The most novel, and by far the most striking, was that of the Highlanders sadding in London, and deputed from the Highland assembly. The summons was—

'Come every hill-plaid, and
'True heart that wears one.'

Their 'gathering pince,' this morning, was the Crown and An-chor Tavern, and they were coming from an early hour 'All plaided and plumed in their tartan array.' In the number were several gentlemen, we understand, of very high rank in the army, and some connected with distinguished characters in the senate and at the bar. They were all in full Highland dresses each having a texten isolest and bill with Highland dresses, each having a tartan jacket and kilt, with the plaid in rich folds over the shoulder, hose, pouch, black velvet stock, and 'bonnet blue,' decorated with the 'eagle plume' mixed with cetrich feathers. A sort of collar of white silk was worn over the plaid, and a large resette of white riband on the breast. The procession consisted of 12 landaus and four, all with white horses—the postliions having white small-clothes, waisto outs, and hats, with white cockades and buff jackets.

The scene presented, when all were assembled, was, indeed, scene to make a Highlander's heart swell with strong feeling. The powerful tones of the bag-pipe excited ideas and feelings in his light associated with all these gaind in moral courage, and all that is tender in demestic life. The strong impression upon every mind of the immediate purpose in view—the recollection that they were about to proceed with their recongratulations to the presence of the most magnanismus of Princesses—A Queen calumniated and presecuted, yet unspotted and triumphant; this feeling in every Highland breast gaye indescribable pathos and meaning to the music of their native highs. It was joy mixed with sadness. They thought of the days that were next when her Matters would indule her form hills. It was joy mixed with sadness. They thought of the days that were past when her flajesty could indulge her fancy in all the brilliant and heart delighting visions of affection and hope; they thought of the bitter reverse which fate made irrevocable; and they sighed for their Queen; but they thought again of the infamy, degradation, and misery into which power, craft, and perjury would have plunged a virtuous and afflicted Queen, and they rejoiced in the unexampled escape of her Majesty. Such ware the mixed emotions with which they proceeded to offer congratulations to their Queen. Two Highland pipers sat in the first landay, and at half-past eleven o'chock when the procession moved forward, a pibroch, 'waked its wild voices meen,' and 'fired their Highland blood with mickle when the procession moved forward, a pibroch, 'waked its wild votes snew,' and 'fired their Highland blood with mickle glee.' A large flag of silk plaid, with sky-blue streamers was carried in the same landan. The spectacle was in every respect most interesting. The tartan cress must have awakened many a scene of mist and mountain, glen and strath, in the wearers, who evidently were their thoughts upon their faces, while kindled eyes flashed beneath the bonnets cocked upon their brows. The crowd assembled to see this procession was more languaged in actionizer condicilly in the feelings. very large, and seemed to participate cordially in the feelings of the Highlanders." we come to the event of events-the thing of

"At Hyde Park-corner Mr. and Mrs. Hume, in their private carriage, joined the procession, and fell into the line immediately behind the landau in which the address was carried. They were greated with the warmest cheers along the whole line of their march from the Crown and Anchor to Brandese burgh-house.

There is a picture! Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Hume in their private carriage—not in their state coach. How amiable and condescending;—but see what they did afterwards.

"They marched into the long gallery with colours flying and pipes playing. When all were regularly arranged, and while the pipes played 'Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled,' her Majesty entered."

Now what may our seaders suppose her Majesty did the moment she entered? She—the Times says—" immediately turned round"—alarmed at what she saw proba-However, upon her turning round, " she recognized the four-and-twenty Highlanders," whom she had never seen before or heard, though they had stumped through her long gallery, with Pillgarlick and his wife at their headpipes playing and colours flying; but when she recognized them, they bowed with prefoundest respect to her Majesty." This substation, in full Highland dress—in Majesty." This suntation, in full Highland dress—in kilts—had such an effect upon the Queen, that she declared to Lady Anne Hamilton she had never seen such Lord Archibald Hamilton, Peter Moore, and Waithman and Hobbouse, were in Court dresses—with waistcoats and breeches, as usual; and Pilgarlick introduced the chairman, whose name is assiduously concealed, to the Queen.

In order then to express their feelings in the most in-telligible manner, the mover of the Address (name not known) read it in the Gaelic language .-- "This, (says the Times) was perhaps the first time that any King or Queen of this country ever listened to an address in that ancient language."—We should think so. Addresses are often enough unintelligible, but it remained for the Queen to receive one which was professedly so.

Mr. Alderman Wood then read the following answer; which, for bombestical nonsense, out-herods all the stuff which ever preceded it; but it has the merit of being in consonance with the Address, by being as utterly incomprehensible:

"It is with unfelgned complacency that I accept this artless tribute of glowing affection and generous loyalty, from an assembly of the metropolis, who are natives of that romantic re-gion where the spirits of departed warriors still speak in the winds, swim upon the clouds, or gleam upon the kills. I am well aware that they come from the land which is 'renowned for faithfulness to its chiefs, and that their fathers bled for a for faithfulness to its chiefs, and that their fathers bled for a Sovereign who had no other claim to their support but that which grief gives to the faded cheek and the sunken eye. They are patives of that land, where adversity attracts more regard than the smiles of fortune; where the houseless have a home, and the friendless never want a friend."

Here's imagery!—Here's beauty of thought! Departed warriors swimming on clouds, and gleaming upon hills—
"I was sure that griefs like those which I have suffered, warriors swimming on clouds, and gleaming upon hills—

"I was sure that griefs like those which I have suffered, and persecutions like those which I have undergone, would not be objects of indifference to those who were born and reared in that district where the brave are sensitive, and the sensitive brave. Their minds could not contemplate with apathy a fond mother, roaming like an exile in a distant land, while her-only child was in vain imploring her presence with that look of solicitude, and that gaze of importunity, that mark the parting hour. The dark cloud of death soon covered her nowy breast! Grief sat on every brow, and the face of the country appeared as if the desolating blast had traversed the land. Her remains needed no obsequies. Her tomb was the tomb of vir-remains needed no obsequies. Her tomb was the tomb of virtue: affection sepalchred her memory in every heart."

Now not to speak of the parade of grief for the loss of a daughter, for whom she cared so little, that, in her own private circle, she did not afford one day of mourning.
The heartless allusion to an event which no mother of real sensibility could make to fifty strange men, (half-naked or not), stamps the sort of feeling which attaches itself to the memory of ther child. The Queen's Maternal woe is a part of her stock in trade, and when the is dressing to receive the scum of the Metropolis, on Saint Monday, she puts it on as regularly and mechanically as she does the stain on her eye-brows, or the paint on her cheeks.

"The years that are passed, and are to be no more, are but as things that have only an ideal existence in the memory; but things that have only an ideal existence in the memory; but still they may cause the eye to stream with tears, or the bosom to heave with regret. The loveliness that has sunk into the grave is still lovely in the mind; and in that form which virtue has made its abode; death is not lasting oblivion, but increased and permanent reminiscence. By is truth, it is integrity, it is because the state of the succession, in one word, it is goodness, pure and holy, that converts the mortal into the immortal, the dying thito, the ever-living, the shadow into the substance; the fugitive into the fixed, time into eternity!" eternity!"

This paragraph contains some information of importnnce. It announces to us in the first place, that the year 1818 will never return; this discovery is doubtless the result of some deep deliberation at Brandenburgh House. We are then told, that "loveliness sunk into the grave" it is truth—it is integrity—it is benevolence—it is the amiable—the generous—the sincere; or, in one word, "it is goodness," &c.

This is sublime; but not quite original. We have seen some lines very like it in a celebrated song--" Like a pil,

" Like a mill,
" Like a whale,

" Like a flail, "Like a rock, " Like a clock,

"In short, its like nothing on earth but a woman."
After a reply, the sham Highlanders kissed hands, and retired. In getting up, one or two of them fell; but they did not seem at all abashed by the accident, which, considering the style of their dress, was somewhat awkward. The Queen was quite delighted at the firmness they displayed on the occasion.

Lady Anne was dressed in a Tartan plaid; and looked "Gods how she looked!"

Charming in spite of her teeth!

This assemblage of mountebanks (as much Highlanders as Mr. Waithman) returned to town quite delighted with their day's trip, amidst the bagpipes, which "sang i'the nose" with their usual effect. Who paid the piper we are at no loss to discover !

TO JOHN BULL

SIR,...Concluding that you are notherejudiced, though you may be severe, I hope, in justice to my own family and some of our neighbours, you will allow me to say a few words respecting one of the ladies mentioned in your analysis of the Queen's visitors.

The lady I mean is Mrs. Wilden and I think it has

The lady, I mean, is Mrs. Wilde-and I think it but seen to say, that that is has not visibly decreased since her visit to Brandenburg House. It is to Mrs. Wilde's own low origin the defection of Mr. Wilde's acquaintance may be attributed-she was (as perhaps you know) servant-maid to old Mr. Devaynes, the banker. And we do not think fit to bring into our drawing-rooms persons whose proper sphere is the kitchen. To the poor Queen under her disgrace these distinctions seem absurd, but as my wife's footman rides behind her chariot and not in it, she is rather more particular—I am, Sir, yours, &c.

COURTS MARTIAL

Sentence on Paymaster John Jennings, of the 7th Dragoon Guards.

Horse Guards, Dec. 4, 1820. SIR,—Having laid before the King the proceedings of General Court Murtial, held in Piershill Barracks, on the 24th and 25th of October, 1820, for the Trial of Pay-master John Jennings, of the 7th Dragoon Guards, who was arraigned upon the under-mentioned charges, viz.:

" 1st. For having, between the 25th of June and the 24th of September, 1819, embezzled or misapplied the sum of seven hundred and forty-one pounds fourteen shillings and three-pence-halfpenny of the public money, which came into his hands in his capacity of Paymaster -2d. For having, between the 25th of September, and the 24th of December, 1819, emberzled or misapplied the further sum of one hundred and sixty-six pounds, four-teen shillings, and nine-pence, of the public money, which came into his hands in his capacity of Paymaster.—3d. For having, between the 25th of December, 1819, and the 24th of March, 1820, inserted charges in the paylist for that period, amounting in the whole, to two hundred and eighty-five pounds, ten shillings and sixpence, although it appears by the certificates of Captains of troops, that the same was not paid, thereby making it appear, that upon that account there was a balance due to him by the public of third party of the same was a balance due. to him by the public, of thirty pounds, eighteen shillings and four-pence-halfpenny; whereas, in fact, there was a balance by him to the public, of two hundred and fiftyfour pounds, twelve shillings and three balfpence. For having, between the 25th of December, 1819, and the 24th of March, 1820, embezzled or misapplied the sum of fifty-one pounds, twelve shillings, and nine pence, being the stoppages paid into his hands for the use of the contractor, by the officers of the 7th Dragoon Guards, for 4,957 rations of oats supplied to their horses, which sum has been re-imbursed by the regimental agent, by order of the Secretary of War, to the contractor, in consequence of Paymaster Jennings declaring his inability. to do so....5th. For having embezzled or misapplied, at different times, various sums of money, amounting in the whole to the sum of three hundred and thirty-one pounds. fourteen shillings and nine pence-halfpenny, which came into his hands in his capacity of Paymaster of the 7th Dragoon Guards."

Upon which charges the Court came to the following

" The Court having deliberately considered the charges proferred against Paymaster John Jennings, of the 7th Dragoon Gnards, the admission of the prisoner, the evidence and statements on both sides, with the whole procedure, is of opinion that he is guilty of a misapplication of the several sums, as stated in the different charges, in breach of the Articles of War; and does therefold sentence the prisoner, the said Paymentes some mentions and be dismissed from His Majesty's are me, did to mine good the several sums so misa, plied by aim.

"The Court is satisfied that the prisoner to act the trettedulent or improper intention in in ertical in the pay-ust, for the period from 25th December, 1819, to 24th March, 1820, as mentioned in the third charge, as the said paylist, when transmitted by him to the War Othice, was accompanied by statements from most respectable commanding officers, the Court recommends the prisoner to his Majesty's favourable consideration.

"I have to acquaint you that His Majesty was pleased to approve and confirm the finding and sentence of the Court; but, in consideration of the earnest recommendation of the Court in favour of the prisoner, of the strong testimonials from every superior officer of the regiment, which he produced, his long services, and of various cirdumstances which appeared upon the face of the proceedings, in mitigation of the crime with which he was charged, His Majesty was most graciously pleased to extend his pardon to the prisoner, Paymaster John Jennings; of the 7th Dragoon Guards, and to command, in his of the purishment of the command. the punishment awarded by the Court, that he shall make good the several sums misapplied by him, and shall be placed upon half-pay.—I am, Sir, yours, "FRDERICK, Commander in Chief.

Maj.-Gen. Sir T. D. Bradford, K. C. B. or Officer commanding the Troops in North Britain."

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

ALTHORP.—In announcing a fire which broke out on Thursday meening se might, at three o'clock, at this venerable and magnificent mansion, it affords us, at the same time, the sincerest pleasure to add, that it was extinguished after the destruction of one of the offices (we believe the laundry) where it originated. Owing to a plentiful supply of water, and the engines belonging to the house being in excellent order and well-served, the flames, which raged furiously, did not extend beyond the premises just noticed.

BARNSLEY.—A public meeting was held in the Public Office at Barnsley, on Thursday se'nnight, for taking into consideration the propriety of presenting a dutiful and loyal address of fidelity and attachment to our King and our venerable Constitution, which was attended by most of the respectable inhabitants of the town. Some Radical oraters attended, and complained, though the meeting had been advertised several days, that they had not re-ceived sufficient notice. An address was agreed to, and has been signed by all the principal, and nearly the whole of the respectable inhabitants.

BERMINGHAM.—On Friday, a numerous and highly aspectable meeting of the Inhabitants, friendly to the section of an address of loyalty and attachment to his Majesty at the present juncture, was held at the Police Office in this town. The meeting was at first intended merely as a preliminary one, but in consequence of a number of our townsmen who attended, a strong desire was manifested to enter at once into a consideration of an address. J. Spooner, Esq. was unanimously called to the chair, and the business was regularly proceeded on. The chair, and the business was regularly proceeded on.
The Rev. Mr. Spry, after a few introductory remarks on the measurity of persons stepping forward, and openly svowing their sentiments in these perilous and divided times, submitted to the judgment of those assembled, an address he had prepared, and which having been seconded, and put from the chair, was immediately and unanimously adopted.—(Birm. Gaz. Dec. 18.)

Bancksunn.—Last week a destructive fire broke out na the sizing house near Water street, belonging to H. Sardell, Esquand occupied by Mr. W. Halton. The whole of the interior of the building was consumed in a short time, together with the utensils, warps, &c. One part of the building was occupied by Messra. R. and R. Railton, machine-makers. The property destroyed is to a consistent water than the property destroyed is to a consistent water than the property destroyed is the property destroyed.

CAMBRIDGE.—About one o'clock on Friday morning John Gooper, game-keeper to Colonel Adeane, of Babraham, accompanied by H. Stubbins, W. Wisby, and L. Bunting, weat round the plantations for the purpose of Bunting, went round the plantations for the purpose of detecting poachers. About three o'clock they heard the report of a gun, upon which they separated, each taking a different direction towards the place from whence the sound proceeded. Wisby and Stubbins soon perceived two desperate poachers, named William Bonnet, of Stapleford, and John Pratt: they ran off. Wisby and his companions soon overtook them, when a despense cuitle consued. The same keeper was now fast approaching ensued. The game-keeper was now fast approaching, ensued. The game-keeper was now last approaching, and within a few yards of them, when Bonnet, levelling his gam at Wisby, shot him in the right side, when he fell, and almost instantly expired. Cooper rushed upon the murderer, succeeded in overpowering him, and bound his hands; but, in the confusion, the prisoners effected their greans and have not since hear heard of The their escape, and have not since been heard of. The deceased has left a widow and three children to deplore

"CAMBRIDGE, TRINITY COLLEGE, Dec. 17.—"I am happy in being able to add another instance of loyalty to those which are now every day confounding the advo-cates of anarchy and disobedience. After our concert on Friday evening, at which nearly 600 persons were present an unanimous demand was made for the national air of God save the King, with which the orchestra immediately complied. The vocal part was sustained by Miss stely complied. The vocal part was sustained by Miss Stevens, with great enthusiasm and feeling, though frequently stepped by the loud and rapturous applause of the whole room. The Under-graduates, standing on the benches, joined in the chorus. It is quite impossible to convey any adequate idea of the effect produced by the words 'Confound rits enemies, and make them fall.' A universal and instantaneous burst of applause, which continued for some minutes, totally interrupted the perfornance: and at the conclusion, the waving of caps and handkerchiefs added greatly to the tout ensemble of the scene. In a word, a more deep and enthusiastic feeling of affection for our beloved Sovereign, can never have been witnessed in any assembly whatever."

On the same evening, an assassination took place at Oldfield-lane, in Salford. It appears that two men of the name of Fielding and Fletcher, had a dispute in a public-house. Some words had been used by Fielding relative to Fletcher, which caused Fletcher to determine apon the horrible design of murdering Fielding. He switted for him in an entry through which Fielding had to return home. Whilet he was waiting there a woman tame, whom, on account of the darkness of the night, the murderer did not know. He simed a blow at her, but perceiving his mistake, managed to escape. He shortly came again to the same place, and remained in his concealment until the unfortunate Fielding appeared, when he rushed upon him, and plunged the knile into his body, and the unfortunate man shortly afterwards exbired. An alarm was immediately given, and the mur-derer was shortly apprehended. The revengeful villain having effected his diabolical intent, offered no resistance to the constables, and was safely ledged in the New Oxford .- The following extraordinary fact lately occurred at Cropledy Lawn, in this country. Mr. Chamber-lein had, a cow which in the spring suddenly declined yielding her usual quantity of milk, and was observed frequently to tremble; at Michaelmas she became quite dry, and on the first of November she was put into a stall with other cows, for feeding; her pains, however, seemed to increase; she refused her food, and at length Mr. C. ordered that she should be killed, On opening the body, a small awl was found in the heart! quite perfect, (except the wooden handle) from which it projected about half an inch, and, from the corrupted state of the heart, it must have been there some time.

St. Alban's.—Three candidates have started for this borough, in consequence of the death of the late W. T. Robarts, Esq.—viz. Sir Harry Wright Wilson, of Chelsea; Charles Ross, Esq. son of General Ross, of Lammer-park, Herts; and John Easthope, Esq. of Finchley. The contest will be a spirited one. Mr. Easthope starts upon the Opposition interest, and will be strongly opposed by the Corporate and Cecil Interest. He has been whimsically nick-named Mr. Least-hope. This morning his Majesty rode out, having every appearance of the enjoyment of most excellent health. The King was accompanied by the Duchess of Gloucester and the Princess Augusta. The Royal party proceeded through Windsor Park to his Majesty's cottage, and inspected the improvements and the alterations which are making there, and returned to Frogmore to WORKINGTON .-- At a meeting at Workington Hall, last week, on occasion of the proposed illumination, Mr. Curwen (the Whig for Cumberland) declared "That for himself, though he rejoiced in the abandonment of the Bill of Pains and Penalties) it was impossible for him to lay his hand upon his heart, and say, that he believed the Queen to be an innocent woman."

The Smithfield Club Cattle Show was held last week in Mr. Sadler's yard, Goswell-street, when the judges distributed prizes. Among the company present, were the Duke De Cazes, (the French Ambassador) the Duke of Dorset, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of Thanet, &c. The company afterwards dined at Freemason's Hall, Sir John Sanders Sebright in the Chair.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

It is with much concern we announce the death of W Shipley, Esq. eldest son to the very Reverend the Dean of St. Asaph, which took place at Hieres, in the South of France, on the 29th Nov. last, under the following circumstances:—He was shooting, attended by a peasant of the place, who also carried a gun. Mr. Shipley had killed a bird, and was getting over a bank to pick it up, the man following with his gun cocked, it unfortunately went off within two or three yards of Mr. Shipley, and lodged its contents in the back of his head, which literally shattered it to pieces. He was in the 43d year of his age, and has left a widow and two children to lament

On Tuesday night an inquest was held at the Stag, in Castle-lane, Westminster, on the body of W. Jones, aged 29. He was employed by the Gas Light Company, in Peter-street, where he was at work on the 6th ult. on a plank suspended from the dome of the rotont house, which was being covered with an iron roof, the inside of which another man was tarring, who sat upon the other end; when it overshot, and both were precipitated to the bottom, a height of 20 feet. The deceased had both his arms broken, and his knee and other parts of his body much injured; the other man was senseless, but has recovered since. The deceased lingured till Tuesday, when he expired. The Jury returned a Verdict of— " Accidental Death.'

BREAKING OUT OF PRISON.-A few evenings back, five of the convicts who were confined in the New House of Correction at Brixton, effected their escape in a very daring marmer. . The prison is not wholly finished, and this circumstance inspired some of the boldest thieves with a hope of being able to break out by some means or other, and accordingly five of them leagued together for the purpose. The absence of the workmen was determined on as the signal, and as soon as they went sway, some of the prisoners seized on the builder's ladder, by theens of which they scaled the wall, and got away. Two out of the five were shortly afterwards re-captured, and to their great chagrin, lodged again in their old quarters. On Sunday last private information was received, that another of the delinquents, named Haswell, who was cast another of the definquents, named Haswell, who was cast for death at the last assizes, was concealed in a public-house in Blue Anchor-lane, Bermondsey; thither the officers went, and found him as described, disguised in a countryman's smock-frock. This man being the most desperate, wylolent resistance was anticipated; but the moment he saw the officers, he told them he was completely disputied; and although he took five constables to apprehend him. last time, yet that he would now go quiefly. He was on Monday conveyed before L. B. Allen, Esq. at Union. Hall, by whom he was re-committed to his old station; the others have, at present, evaded all search.

LONDON MARKETS.

Corn Exchange, Friday, Dec. 22.

There have been but few fresh arrivals of Wheat ance Monday, but what little appeared of fine quality was taken off on quite as good terms; for the thin ordinary sorts, however, scarce an offer can be obtained.—We had some quantity of barley fresh up from Suffolk, which sold on quite as good terms; and Beans and Pease are steady in value.-The Oat trade is dull, and the sales made to day were rather lower than otherwise.—In other articles no variation.

half the charge of this beautiful Volume scarcely exceeds half the charge of the other Editions of the Novels of this

The brut intention of this Publication was formed several years ago, and then announced to the Public through the medium of the Quarterly Review. At that period, an ample collection of materials for the work was made, with great assiduity and care, and a very great expense incurred towards its speedy completion.

Circumstances, wholly uninteresting to the Public. have retarded the Publication till now.

It is intended to reprint, in the present form, Works of the best of the English Novelists, together with selections from the German, French, and Italian, (some of which are already translated, and others in the course of translation,) with Memoirs of the Authors' Lives, and Criticisms on their Writings, prefixed. The Works of such Author will be published separately and complete, in a single volume, as in the present instance, or in two or more, as the length of the compositions shall require.

It is not the Publisher's intention to enlarge, either on the value of his materials, the correctness of the typography, or the beautiful execution of his work. The high source from whence he derives his Literary aid, will be at once recognized; and the present Volume is offered as a specimen of the whole in which ell the others will be avecated. of the style in which all the others will be executed. * * Smollett's Work will be published in March.

While at this port they visited his Majesty's ship Northumberland, where they received every attent on from the commanding officer, Lieut. E. Crouch, and a number of other officers from different ships, who came on board at the time to see them. They were highly delighted with the general economy of the ship marticularly the armonry, the spendeck, the chains particularly the armoury, the gun-deck, the chainmoorings, and the cables. After impecting her most mi-nutely, they sat down to a cold collation in the ward-room; on which occasion, their propriety of conduct and manners. struck the whole company with admiration, forming a striking contrast to their tatooed countenances. We regret to say, that the elder Chief, at the departure of the Speak, was in indifferent health. They return to their native land with most munificent presents; particularly from His Ma-jesty and the Duke of York."

New Intruders on the Revenue .- A few days since, as a vessel was steering for the Downs, nearly opposite St. Margaret's Bay, while two gentleman on board, were amusing themselves with their guns at a piece of board floating on the water, they saw a bird coming towards them (which afterwards proved to be a carrier pigeon.) apparently from the French coast: when it came near enough to observe so many sailors standing on the beach, it made a sudden tack, as it intending to take another course: when it came near the ship, one of the gentlemen shot at and killed it; the boat was sent and the poor bird brought on board, when ob examining it, to the utter astonishment of all present, was discovered between the feathers (chiefly on the neck,) six French gold rings, of the most grand and ingenious workmanship. It is reported, that to prevent such contraband dealings, all the young hawks that can be met with in the ensuing summer, are to be be trained up along the coast, after the same manner as those trained in many parts of Scotland, and that a falconer will be sent from thence to attend this duty. Also mews will be erected at certain places, at regular distances from each other, for their reception during the nights, as this illicit traffic by the feathered tribe can be carried on by day light only. We wanderstand this is to be called the Flying Coast Blockade. Kent Paper.

FOREIGN I ELLIC NCL

Paris, DEC. 20.-Guard has been affected Trearn in the arrendis sement of Caen. He was immediately conveyed to Paris, by virtue of a mandate of the Commission of the Court of Peers employed in the Instruction relative to the conspiracy of the 19th August. He has since been liberated.

The remains of M. Naldi was interred on Sunday, in the cemetery of Pere La Chaise, after a funeral service in the Church of St. Reche.

J. B. Millard, ex-chef-d'escudron, was yesterday brought before the Court of Assize, accused of a conspiracy against the family of the Bourbons. The document on which this accusation was founded was a writing signed by the prisoner and two other persons, who denounced him, containing an oath by which they engaged not to betray each other, and toacknowledge in France no other government but that which would secure liberty without royalty. The prisoner was asked if he was not accused of being the founder of the society called "the Sleeping Lion," and whether he had not fled from the charge? To which he replied, that, if he were accused of stealing the towers of Notre Dame Cathedral, he would follow the advice of a learned counsel, and endeavour to evade prosecution. The examination of Signard and Vanversain was then taken, who proved that the prisoner had held the language, and written the oath, of which he was accused.

CHAMBER OF PEERS.

At noon the Chamber assembled, in virtue of the order of the King, communicated at the opening of the sittings.

The President called to the bureau four of the youngest peers, as provisional secretaries. The President read a letter, offering a guard of honour to the Chamber during the time of its sittings by order of the The definitive bureau was then elected.

Five peers were then elected to prepare an address n answer to the King's speech. The rest of the sit-ting was employed in the formation of the bureaux, their organization, and the election of the Committee of Petitions. Adjourned at 12 o'clock. CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

At noon M. Angles, the senior of the Chamber, took the Chair.

The four junior members of the Chamber were elected as provisional secretaries, and took their seats at the bureaux. A guard of honour was offered to the Chamber, and accepted during its sittings. The nine bureaux were then balotted for; and, the Chamber adjourned.

Naples, Dec. 5.—On Friday, Dec. 1, the Minister for Foreign Affairs proceeded to parliament, which, being formed into a Secret Committee, heard the proposition of the Minister.

There are some reports on the details of this sitting but we cannot guarantee their authenticity. It is said that the Minister announced the menacing attitude of the Austrians, and insinuated at the same time that the war might be avoided if the parliament would listen to the propositions which assuredly would lead to the re-establishment of good harmony among all the powers. It is said that several deputies rejected with indignation every proposition that appeared to dictate by force a change in the basis of the constitution, and that the President, after having consulted the as-sembly, declared that the parliament being occupied in discussing the modifications which it should think expedient to make in the constitution, it should not and could not attend to propositions which interfered in its deliberations between the constituted powers.

Further intelligence from Naples, announces, that the King had set out from that capital on the 13th, on board the English ship Vengeur. The same intelligence adds, that the Minister of Foreign affairs, M. de Campo Chiaro, has been accused, and succeeded by the Duke de Gallo. Į, ing and respect, we have this day to record that his Excellency Henry William Bentick, our late Lieutenant-Governor, departed from this transitory state of existence to enter upon that of eternal life, on Wednesday night last, the 1st of November, after long and lingering sufferings, to the extreme grief of his many sincere friends, as well as to the general regret cfalmost every member of our little community. The mild and humane character of this distinguished in-dividual is too well known, and too generally acknowledged, to stand in need of sophisticated panegyric: let it suffice us to say, that he was a true friend to religion, justice, and humanity: and we believe that there is scarcely an inhabitant of this colony who is not convinced that "he hath borne his great faculties meekly in his great office," notwithstanding much violent though unmeaning opposition during his al-ministration. His Excellency Major Thistlewayte, of the 2d, or Queen's, has been sworn in Acting-Governor. His Honour Heury Beard, Esq. President of the Colony of Berbice, has been reinstated, by Proclamation, in all the respective offices, from which he had been suspended by his Excellency, the late II. W. Bentick, Esq his Majesty having been most graciously pleased to disapprove of such suspension.

Boyer, President of Hayti, has issued a proclamation, reflecting, in severe terms on the tyranny of Christophe. He expresses his satisfaction, in the name of the country, to all the inhabitants who have profitably served the cause of liberty and equality. also calls upon the military, who have delayed their submission, to present themselves without fear, as he wishes to reconcile not combat. This document is dated from the palace of St. Marc. Oct. 17, 1820.

Extract of a Letter from Rio de Janeiro, dated Oct. 25.—" The company of Capatazia, which had obtained on lease the farming of the duties on merchandize, is not considered secure in retaining that lucrative revenue. The representation of all the merchants to the King, whose justice is well known, appear to have had the desired effect, and already the talk runs freely on some modification. The only fear to be apprehended is from the various interests that beset the court, by which the Capatazia will endeavour to profit, and under the cover of some changes of no importance, procure continued impunity to the great mass of their impositions. The King, perceiving an alteration, will believe that it has been carried to the full extent of his decision, and things will remain as before. Under this impression the renewal of representations from merchants would perhaps meet with a cold reception. The Eiglish merchants have had the influence to procure a Royal Decree, which is of great advantage to them, relative to the valuation of incrchandize. This was formerly regulated by no fixed rules, but governed solely by the caprice or venality of the Custom-house officer. The merchant is now permitted to affix any value to his cargo that he may think proper, but the privilege is reserved to the officer, at his own option to appropriate the goods to his own use, on the payment of ten per cent. on the valuation indicated. This affords a protection to the officer from imposition, and to the merchant from an arbitrary valuation of his cargo. The merchants of other nations are anxious to share the benefits of a similar arrangement.

The Armistice between the Royalist, General Morillo, and the Insurgent Chief, Bolivar, is confirmed. The following is an extract of a letter written by a British officer, dated off Carthagena, Oct. 21:—" All t e people here blame Bolivar for acceding to an armistice with Morillo. It applies, however, only to the armies under these two Chiefs. The main army was under the President near Rossior de Cucuta, consisting of nearly 12,000 men: the second in command, Urdanti; the third, Colonel Paget. The opposing forces of Morillo were at Valencia, consisting by report of nearly 6000. The second army of consequence was the force in the Apure, under Ceneral Paez, which consisted of 4000 men, including what is termed the British Legion. The other forces were in different divisions of one and two thousand men; one of which, under Colonel Montillo, were closely besieging Santha Martha. The duties here are at the enormous rate of 33½ per cent., and yet the impostors from Jamaica are realizing 100 per cent. on the cargoes lately landed."

Santa Fe, having been evacuated by the Patriots, is again in the possession of the Royalists. The defeat of the besieging army under General Montillo, who had in consequence left that part of the country is Repeal of the Countervailing Duty on Books between Great Britain and Ireland.

Treasury Chambers, 27th Oct. 1820. -The Lords Commissioners of His Ma-GENTLEMENjesty's Treasury having had under their consideration the subject of the expediency of repealing the Countervailing Duty on Books imported into Great Britain from Ireland, or into Ireland from Great Britain, while a corresponding drawback is paid in the country from which they are exported. I have received their Lordships' commands to direct you not to charge the countervailing duty, or to allow drawback on Books, Maps, and Prints, belonging to, and removed for, the private use of persons changing their residences, or passing and repassing from one country to the other certificates being in every case produced that no draw-back has been allowed on their shipment.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, Dec. 23. Kean v. Crofts.

This was an action to recover 1001, money lent by the plaintiff to defendant's wife, previous to her mar-The facts were as follow-

Mrs. Medhurst (such was the name of the Lady pre-vious to her intermarrying with Mr. Crofts) had fallen into some pecuniary difficulties, and seeing no probability of a speedy end to them, she determined to set bility of a speedy end to them, sne determined to set herself free from anxiety, by taking the benefit of the Insolvent Act. The plaintiff, desirous of assisting her, advanced her 1001, to re-purchase her furniture, which, by the provisions of this Act, were to be disposed of for the benefit of her creditors. Mrs. Medhurst giving her warrant of Attorney as security, matters were soon arranged; but Mrs. Medhurst as soon as she was relieved from the importunities of her creditors, submitted herself to those of Mr. Croft, and ditors, submitted herself to those of Mr. Croft, and took upon herself the bonds of matrimory. The plaintiff soon after applied for payment of his 100l, but Mr. Crofts demurred to pay, and the plaintiff was under the necessity of administering to him the present unpalatable dose of law. It appeared that the de-endant knew of the 100l, having been lent, and of the warrant of attorney having been given. The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 100l, costs

Milner and Morris v. Williams.

The plaintiffs were glass-cutters, the defendant a gentleman of fortune. The action was brought to recover 351, the price of a lustre, made as it was contended, to the order of the defendant. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff was, that the defendant went to the shop of the plaintiffs, and desired to look at a lustre. Some were shewn, but he did not approve of any of them. The plaintiffs offered to put up one for the defendants to see; this was accordingly done, and notice was given to defendant, who came and looked at it, accompanied by his son. The son objected to it, as being too long, and desired to have one made shorter; this was done, and notice was given of it to the defendant that this new one was put up. Mr. Williams then came and looked at it, and said, "Well, I like this very well; and Mrs. Williams shall come and look atit." Mrs. Williams did not come, but the sons did; and one of them expressed a desire to have a few more drops put to it. This was accordingly done, and the lustre was sent nome; but the defendant returned it, with a note written on the back of the bill, saying, "the article you sent is not what I intended or agreed for." The plaintiffs now brought their action; and the defence set up was, that no order whatever was given; and that the lustre in question, as well as the two former, were only put up for de-fendant to look at. The defendant offered 30l. for it, on account, as he said, of the trouble he had given the plaintiffs, but he would give no more. The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs-Damages 36l. costs

The Court, at its rising, adjourned to Wednesday the 10th of January. His Lordship intimated, that on the Wednesday and Thursday he would take the remaining common juries, and on Friday would commence with the special juries.

CORONER'S INQUEST.

On Wednesday, at three o'clock, an inquisition was held at the Horns public-house, opposite St. Leonard's Church, Shoreditch, before J. Unwin, and Thomas Stirling, Esqrs. on the body of Charles Taylor, the young man who was found dead under such extra-ordinary circumstances, in Rhodes fields, Hoxton.

It appeared that deceased was found by J. Bird, on the Friday night preceding, between eight and nine o'clock, lying against the pathway railing; his head of the latter.

was on the ground, and there was a great quantity of blood near him. They examined the body and found a deep wound on the breast, from which blood was flowing, and his waistcoat and shirt were cut as if with a sharp instrument.

Joseph Richardson deposed to the same effect.

Mr. Crockwell, a beadle of St Leonard's, stated; that he had seen the deceased's brother, and the young woman whom he called his wife. The latter told him that the deceased was by trade a bricklayer, but had been several months out of work, during which time they had lived on property which she possessed. He had since discovered that she was his own niece.

An anonymous letter was read by the Coroner, from a gentleman whom Taylor had attempted to rob. It stated, that deceased attacked him with a bludgeon, and threatened to blow his brains out if he did not deliver his money; that the writer, fearful of his own life, shot the deceased, after vainly attempting to get from him.

Mr. Unwin stated, that this letter could not be received in evidence.

The Jury, after a consultation of a quarter of an hour, returned the following verdict?—" The deceased came to his death by a wound from a pistol ball, inflicted on him in Rhodes's Felds, near Hoxton, under circumstances of which this Jury have no means of judging."
On Thursday a Coroner's Inquest was held at the Rose and Crown public-house, in Bunhill-row, before T. W. Unwin, Esq. over the body of Martha Singleton, the unfortunate companion of Charles Taylor, who was shot in Rhodes's-field, near Hoxton.

In the neck were three stabs, apparently made by some sharp instrument, as a pair of scissors; on the left arm was another wound of the same nature. On the right arm were several large cuts, apparently from a knife. The deceased was about twenty-five years of age, and was a fine young woman.

The first witness called was a young man named William Walpole, who stated that on Monday morning, at about twenty minutes after ten o'clock, he was called upon by the landlord to assist him in getting into the room occupied by the deceased, as the door was fistened inside. When he got in he saw some blood at the bottom of the bed; he let in the landlord and some other persons. The deceased was in bed and spoke to the witness, to whom she said that she was dying. He saw a wound in her neck.

vived about twenty minutes afer he saw her.

J. Pearcy, the landlord of the house, deposed that the deceased had lodged in his house about twelve weeks and had been introduced as a married woman. He saw the body of the deceased Charles Taylor at Shoreditch Church, and immediately recognized him. Witness told the deceased on Sunday night that he thought the man who was killed at Hoxton was her husband. She had appeared extremely uneasy from the time of his absence, but on learning the intelligence she looked distracted. She expressed a wish to go and see the body that night, but he told her that it was too late, and appointed, to go with her the next morning. The next morning he went up to her room morning. The next morning he went up to her room to ask her if she was ready to go; he knocked at the door, but received no answer, and found that the door was fast. He then went into his own room, and knocked at the partition, which divided the two rooms, just over the head of the bed. Receiving no answer, the partition was forced aside, and he got into the room, he at first perceived nothing particular, and requested her to get up, when she made no answer. The first witness, Walpole, told him that the deceased had bled herself, when the witness immediately ran to Mr. Smith, the parish Doctor, who did not come. He then sent for a coach to take the deceased to the hospital, but before the coach arrived the deceased was dead. A knife and a pair of scissars covered with blood, were found in the bed.

L. Crockwell stated that on Sunday morning the deceased was extremely agitated, on learning Taylor's fate; and throughort his conversation with her, she appeared in the most pitiable anguish.

The Jury returned a verdict, Killed herself under a temporary fit of insanity.

A Correspondent in The Times, who wishes to throw discredit upon a loyal address from the City of Worcester, proceeds thus in his object:

"I will now explain in what way, and by whom, this Address has been signed: by the Mayor, Recorder, Aldermen, and whole Corporate Body, their officers, and dependents, and by a very liberal distribution of cakes and wine; by the alms-house men, who are under the guardianship of the Aldermen; by our re-representative, Lord Deerhurst (son of the Recorder), who, it is well known, is immical to the Queen; by the Dean, Prebendaries, and their domestics; by the minor Canons, and nearly all the Clergy of the city and neighbourhood; by country Magistrates and Gentlemen, many of whom reside a great distance from Worcester; and by the partners of the Old Bank (the head of which from is Signal Landmark Bart Receiver head of which firm is Sir A Lechmere, Bart. Receiver General of the county), their clerks and servants."

Of what better materials, we ask, can any address be composed than those above described? There are the Civil Authorities of the City—the Corporate Body—one of the representatives in Parliament—the Dean and Prehendaries, nearly all the Ciergy of the City and neighbourhood—the County Magistrates, and Gentlemen, and the partners of a most respectable Banking-house. We should like to know, if such men as these do not represent the wealth, the respecability and the character of a place, where we are to ability and the character of a place, where we are to look for them. We suppose among those who ordinarily sign Radical Addresses—petty shop-keepers—insolvents—lodgers, and rabble.

A method of diminishing the resistance to wheel-carriages, arising from the inequalities of the surface of the streets, has been practised in some of the towns of Italy, and is about to be tried in one of the streets of Fdiphurch. The plan consists in laying parallel to of Edinburgh. The plan consists in laying parallel to each other, and at the distance of the usual breadth of the width of our kirb-stones, in the carriage-road, somewhat like the fashion of a groove, but not lower than the surface of the other stones. This experiment has, within the last two days, been put to trial, on a small case, in the narrow part of Wych-street, near the Strand. From the narrowness of that street, however, one great annoyance seems likely to result from its adoption in that place. There being no other kennel in that part of the street, the grooves must become the channels of the slop and dirty water; and, being close to the foot-pavement, which has recently been increased in breadth, they cannot fail to expose passen-gers in that unfrequented thoroughfare to be splashed even more than heretofore.

COMMON COUNCIL.—Yesterday se'anight the elec-tion for Common Councilmen closed. We rejoice to find that Mr. Pearson, the patriot attorney, has been chasseed. Mr. Samuel Tipper, the apostate bookseller, of Leadenhall-street, once the devoted tool of Government, and its meanest retainers, and of late a patriot, has also been defeated. When Radicals are too bad for the Common Council, they must be pretty far gone indeed.

We are glad to see that Mr. Jacks and Sir Thom Bell have quitted this assembly. We could wish sincerely that the respectable part of the citizens would rouse from their apathy, and consent to take a part in ... the corporation business; but as it is looked upon with contempt by the bettermost classes, the sooner all apcontempt by the bettermost classes, the sooner all appearance of propriety or decency is withdrawn from it. the better.

The different arrivals of coathes yesterday morning, state, by guards and passengers, that the severity of the weather last night was more than has been felt for many seasons. The fenny counties present a complete body of ice. A great fall of snow took place on Friday between Newark and Turford; and in many parts northward. The River Thames, between Putney and Kew Bridge, is frozen six or seven feet from its banks.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The noble Lord's communication has been received—he will see by the leading Article of this day's Paper, what very great attention we have paid to his entertaining Lecture:—we are surprised at his Lordship's meanness, which is only equalled by his stupidity.

A. B.'s letter surprised us.—We are extremely obliged for his hint—our object is to do just what he appears to wish us to do.

Zig Zag we are much indebted to.—We shall not fail to deserve such patronage: it is by zeal like his that our Country is to be saved.

Mrs. Serres had better be quiet—the Gentleman she sent to the affice this week, we have a high regard for, and mean no disrespect to him, who is merely a professional adviser; but as she positively a clares that she is not the Mrs. Serres who acted at Covent Garden, she necessarily must be the Mrs. Serres who left her clothes to pawn for lodging with Mr. Benjamin Laver, the Sheriff a afficer, the last time she was arrested and confined in his house. She had better have sat down content with the imputation of being an actress—Lady Derby, Lady Craven, and the lovely Lady Thurlow, would have been better compeers for her than the drabs of a spunging house.—Will she worry us any more?

"Ne sutor ultra Crepidum" has been received.

We beg to make our acknowledgments to our Correspondents at Dover, Coventry, Newcastle upon Tyne, Carlisle, Bath, Edinburgh, Dublin and Falmouth. It is most gratifying to find the same spirit pervading all parts of the Empire.

We have received a letter from Thomas Skinner, of 109 Tollenhom Court Road, begging us to return his public thanks to Mr. Sheriff Parkins, for some kindness done to him in Newgate. We know Mr. Sheriff Parkins so well that it gives us real pleasure to record any thing good of him, as a set-off against his general conduct through life.

The letter from Mr. Lechmere Charlton's friend contains reasons for delaying that Gentleman's exposure for another week, but not for abandoning it altogether.

The sensible letter of a "Wellwisher" shall be attended to. We have not been able to make the arrangements this week, but we trust very shortly to do so.

Our fair friend's proposition of the present to the Queen we think a good one: but we doubt, if we complied with her wish, and opened the subscription, whether she would put her real name, even to such a cadeau as the one she suggests.—Whatever her command may be to us, she need not repeat the order on her seal to enforce immediate compliance

In answer to the "Nil Admirari" we can only say, that we fear the communication he enclosed has lost its novelty, but we are thankful for his letter.

Peter Plainway's observations on the Radicals who have been educated in Christ's Hospital (a Royal Charity)

Our Friend whose letter was put into the post in Park Street, will see how much we are obtiged to him.

We had the happiness of stating last week, that the unparalleled patronage which our Paper has received, proves that the real and unintimidated sense of the Country approves of our principles.

A more glorious and important proof than any that could relate to such humble concerns as ours, has, during the last few days, shewn that the sentiments of lovalty to the King, and of approbation to the measures of his Government, pervades the most distant parts of the Country. The Hero of WATERLOO-the greatest name of modern history, equal to Marlborough in courage and prudence, above him in private character and in public success-after having been hissed in London by the same mob that applauded the Queen, has been received, in his late tour into Cheshire, with the unanimous and enthusiastic acclamations of the people, due undoubtedly to his high virtues and glorious deeds, but stimuluted and inflamed by a recollection of the indignity which had been offered to him, and by the desire to overwhelm in the applause of a grateful country, the croakings of the toad-like satellites of General Wilson and Peter Moore.

In our last number we promised our readers a continued account of the Queen's hoaxes, and we accordingly begin our task.

We have before observed that the Queen began hoaxing very early in life, and we cited Lord Holland as being likely to corroborate some sentiments which we have to make; for the present, however, previously to displaying the Bayswater hoax (to vouch for which we shall call up her own friends) we shall merely relate one little anecdote.

Her Royal Highness having while very young incurred the displeasure of her father, was confined to a particular suite of apartments, under the care of an old domestic. After this restraint had lasted for some months, she was summoned before her relenting parent, and appeared in his presence apparently far advanced in pregnancy; the Duke, astonished and terrified, enquired who was the author of his shame; and the facetious Princess asserted that the servant who attended her, was the father of her child.

The poor old man, half dead with fear, denied, as it might be supposed, the accusation; and after a great deal of torturing suspense, in which she dutifully kept her father, she disencumbered herself of the additional clothing which had given her the desired appearance, and confessed it was a Hoax: conveying, however, the moral lesson to her sire, not to try the experiment of confining her again.

We have heard another version of this story; but we give this, because we believe it comes from the Queen herself.

In the case of Sir William Austin the same spirit of deception and Hoav was carried on.

The discovery of this disposition to fun, must be highly gratifying to the friends and connexions of Lady Douglas, who was hoaxed, not only into the belief that William Austin was her son, but also into the certainty that she had seen the Princess in a state similar to that in which she appeared in earlier life before her father.

We shall by-and-by republish parts of the evidence which was adduced on the "Delicate investigation," from which our readers will be enabled to see with what assiduity and success this system of hoaxing was continued, and which will afford some little excuse for the English witnesses in that investigation—for the Italian witnesses in the trial before the House of Lords—and for the immense majority of the English himself, and have all been, in their turns, housed into a solution conviction of her Majesty's guilt.

But we leave this part of her history, and come to later dates. Let us look at the drollery displayed by the Queen when she desired Lady Charlotte Lindsay to hire her a house at Bayswater professedly for a laundry, but which was never used for such an office—let us put the matter in the way of question to Colonel and Lady Charlotte Lindsay, and see how it will look then.

Lady Charlotte Lindsay. By virtue of your oath did, or did not the Princess of Wales desire you to take a house at Bayswater, professedly for a laundry; and did you not take it?

Did the Princess not desire you to take the house in your own name instead of her's?

Was the house ever used for a laundry?

Did not the Princess meet young Sapio, the singer, there continually?

Did you not conceal all this from your husband by the Princess's command, till the people applied to you for the rent, and you were then obliged to let Colone! Lindsay into the secret?

Now, Colonel and Lady Charlotte Lindsay, we seriously call upon you to rescue the Queen from the imputation of this hoax, if the facts be not such as we state them to be.

Since her Majesty has brought Hoaxes into fashion, they begin to pervade all the employments and business of life; and from the highest politics to the smallest petty larceny, every one who is detected in any error or offence, pleads the fashionable influenca of a Hoax

The Stock Exchange has been within these few days at first alarmed, and afterwards amused with the ramour of a diplomatic hoax, which promises to afford some entertainment.

The French Ambassador, it seems, has written to the Congress at Troppau, that if the English opposition were to come into power, their first act would be the release of Buonaparte: and that for this he has the authority of Mr. Tierney.

The arrival of this dreadful intelligence shook. Troppau to its foundation, and even the magnanimous Alexander himself appears to have been alarmed with the prospect of a second interview on the Niemen, and accordingly there were great commotions: protocols and remonstrances—in due course the direful tidings, like a Cumberland Echo, returned to the place where they were first heard; and Mr. Tierney learned with real or affected astonishment, the designs attributed to him and his party.

"Bless my heart," says Mr. Tierney, "it was only a Hoax: an impertinent fellow chose to ask me silly questions, and I

"Out of my grief and my impatience

"To be so pestered by a poppinjay, Answered neglectingly I know not what;

" Answered neglectingly I k
" I would—or I would not."

The French Ambassador replies that he does not understand Shakespeare, but that if he understands common conversation, Mr. Tierney was as grave and as much in earnest as any man could be—Negatur, quoth Tierney—Affirmatur, quoth the Ambassador; and it is thought that when the weather gets milder, the affair must be terminated on Wimbleton Common.

We have seen in the Times of yesterday, an account of a pamphlet said to be published by Charles Tennison, Esq., M. P. for Grimsby, in which he states, that having come into Parliament expressly to support Ministers, he so disapproves of their conduct towards the Queen, that he has wholly changed his sentiments;—a circumstance "honourable," says the Times, "to his head and his heart."—If this be the goggle-eved lawyer whom we once knew of that name, we are surprised at reading, even in the Times, that he has either a head of a heart; and as to the pretence of his having been a ministerial man, by which he endeavours to bolster his insignificant conundroms into notice, we promise to show, in our next Number, that is neither more nor less than a Lee.

CUNSPIRACY AGAINST THE QUEEN.

So much has been said about a Conspiracy against the Queen, that many worthy people fully believe in its existence, and are persuaded that to this cause alone is to be attributed every stain upon her Majesty's Perjured witnesses alone, it is supposed, could have invented the story of BARON BERGAMI's having been formerly a serjeant in the French army, or a that he was hired as a mere job-caurier to travel from Milan to Naples; that whilst he was in his courier's livery, her Majesty fed him from the carriage-went with him and her chambernaid to a masquerade him down to dinner by her own side; that whilst he was still acting as a livery servant in the household, his sister was introduced (concealing the fact that she d'honneur of her Majesty; that all the Bergami family, with the single exception of Bergami's wife, were in a few months brought to occupy various stations in the household, some sitting beside their Royal Mistress, while some were helping in the stables; that the Queen and Bergami used to row about alone in a canoe, and to walk about arm in arm, particularly on the deck of the polacre on Bergami's patron Saint's day; that the Queen gave him a house and estate; that she acted buffoon parts with him and his brother on a stage before 200 spectators; that peculiar arrangements were made for a communication between her bed-room and his, wherever she went, for at least 400 nights; that the room at Villa d'Este was altered so as to effect such a communication the more conveniently; that the Queen was seen to go from Bergami's bed-room to her own by night at Catania; that Bergami was left alone with her in the bed-room at Scharnitz; that she was seen on the bed with him at Calsunhe; that they were closed in together in the day-time under the state bear the state of the s the tent on board the polacre; and lastly, that they actually slept under the same closed tent for 35 nights together!

This tale, enough to destroy the character of 20 other women, all the Queen's friends before the investigation, and most of them still, were and are satisfied could only be the "filthy invention" of per-

But how stands the fact? Let us take the story to pieces, article by article; and see whether every jot of it is not irresistibly confirmed, either by the positive oaths of the Queen's own witnesses produced at the Bar, or by her withholding the witnesses is honer with the positive of the positive oaths of the positive oaths. ses in her power who could have contradicted it if false.

- I. The first thing that is known of Bergami is that he was in the French army, and the highest rank that he ever attained in it, after having served at least eight years, wasthat of Serjoant .- Proved by the Queen's own witness-Touille.
- 2. Bergami was hired only to go on the job to Naples, as a courier, wearing a livery, and waiting at table; and the highest favour that was requested by the person who by the person who recommended him was, that if he behaved well during the job, he might be continued in the service, and ultimately promoted to be a servant out of livery.—Proved by the Queen's own witnesses, Sicard and Keppel Craven.
- 3. After he had been a few months in his place, and while riding in his courier's dress, he came up to the Queen's carriage and called out a boire Madame! And the Queen, instead of reprimanding or discharging him on the spot for his insolence, handed out a bottle to him herself from the carriage.—Proved by the Queen's own witness, Lady Charlotte Lindsay.
- 4. Some weeks previously to this, Her Majesty went out at night in a common hackney-coach with this Courier and her Chambermaid, all three disguised as common masks, to a public masquerade at Naples.

  Proved by Louis Dumont, confirmed by the Queen's witness, Dr. Holland, and if false, might have been contradicted by the whole Household.
- 5. While Her Majesty was on a tour to Mount St. Gothard, attended by her two couriers, Bergami and Hieronimus, she invited the former to sit down at table with her in his livery, though the other dined with the servants.—This first occurred at Belinzena, and afterwards at Lugano and the Devil's Bridge, and on her return from the tour she took Bergami to dine with her regularly-but not in livery. -Proved by the Queen's own witness, Hownam; might have been disproved, if false, by Hieronimus, who is at Brandenburgh House
- 6. A woman, calling herself the Countess of Oldi (who the Count of Oldi is nobody knows), was introduced into the Queen's Household as the only dame d'honneur: she was the sister of Bergami, but not rowed to be so until several weeks after her introduction, her brother all that time wearing a livery -Proved by Louis Dumont; confirmed by the Queen's Hownam; might have been contradicted, if wilness. fulse, by the whole Household.
- 7. All Bergami's relations, nine or ten in number, with the single exception of his wife, were brought into the Household, some with and some without employment, some sitting at the Queen's table, and some at the same time helping in the stables.—Proved by Du-mont and Majocchi; confirmed by Hownam, and might have been contradicted, if false, by the whole Household.

- 9, While the sailors on board the polacre were making a drunken festival on St. Bartholomew's day, n honour of Bergami, the Queen and he were walking about the deck arm in arm .- Proved by Gargiulo and Paturzo; confirmed by Howanm.
- 10. The gift of the Barona, afterwards called Villa Bergami, is proved by Hownam and Vassali.
- 11. The farcical exhibition of the Queen in the character of Columbine, or of an Automaton, in company with her servants, Louis Bergami as Harlequin, and Bartolomeo Bergami as some other gro-tesque character, and this on a stage before 200 per-sons, is proved by Dumont, and confirmed by How-
- 19. The arrangement of the bed-rooms, at home or abroad, so as to produce an approximation between those of the Queen and Bergami, and this continued for a space of more than 400 nights, is proved by Dumont, Sacchi, and Majocchi; might have been contradicted, if false, by the whole household; but is not attempted to be disproved.
- 13. The alteration in the rooms at the Ville d'Este, for this purpose, or at least with this effect, is proved by Dumont and Cassina; and, if false, might have been contradicted by the whole Household.
- 14. The Queen was seen to go, by night, from Bergami's bed-room to her own at Catania. - Proved by Louise Dumont; might have been contradicted, if false, by Mariette Dumont, Oldi, and Bergami himself.
- 15. Bergami was left in the Queen's bed-room at Scharnitz .- Proved by Dumont confirmed by Vassali.
- 16. The Queeu was seen sitting on Bergami's bed, and his arm round her neck.—Proved by Barbara Kress. An alibi attempted as to the Queen, by Vassali, but failed. Suggested that it might bave been the Countess Oldi. If so, might have been proved by producing the Counters Oldi, and confronting her with Kress; but this was not attempted.
- 17. A tent was raised on the deck of the polacre, which on various occasions was closed during the day, once by direction of Schiavini, and the Queen and Bergami were shut in alone, and so remained for some time.—Proved by Gargiulo, Paturzo, Dumout, Majocchi, and Birollo; might have been contradicted, if false, by Schiavini, and all the people on board, eight of whom were at Brandenburgh House.
- 18. The Queen and Bergami slept 35 nights successively shut up alone in the enclosed and darkened tent.—Proved by Gargiuolo, Paturzo. Dumont. Majocchi, and Birollo; attempted to be disproved by Flinn, but he failed; confessed by Hownam on cross-examination. Might have been disproved, if false, by Schiavini, Hieronimus, Austin, Camera, Carlino, Mariette, Dumont, and Oldi, all of whom were at Brandenburgh

ANALYSIS OF THE QUEEN'S FEMALE VISITORS.

WE copy from the Courier a list of the Queen's female visitors, with some prefatory remarks made by the Editor of that Paper.

" Female character is so essentially the ground-work of all private happiness, and all social order, that we intend to devote particular care and attention to this article.

"If the Ladies of England recognise, by their society, the purity of the Queen, our list will do her and them justice.— If the Ladies of England shrink back from the Queen's society, and that only a few of looser morals, or with perinterests, are found to visit her—then, again, our list will do justice to her and to them.

"On so very delicate and painful a subject, we trust we shall pursue the justest course, by inserting no name on the Queen's list which has not appeared in the Times or the Morning Chronicle, and shall give the greatest care to this list, as well to insert in it all qualified candidates, as to hasten to remove from it, as we have already done in more than one instance. Ladies who have complained, with a just indignation, of the insult and injury offered to their names.

"We shall repeat the list from day to day, and carefully note the new comers, in order that the whole truth of the case may be kept constantly before the public eye.

" The Queen of England is one of the tast women whom an bonourable man would wish to see associate with his wife, or set an example to his daughters.'—Lord Ellenborough's Speech in the House of Lords.

We now proceed to Lady Lindorse.

That there is no such person our readers know as well as the Queen, who permits this name to figure in her list. There is a masculine personage called Jack of Bray, who, in her correspondence with the member for Wallingford, was once taken for a gentleman, and who, we believe, has taken a fancy to assume the title. All we take upon ourselves to say is, that she is no

Mrs. Archdeacon Bathurst, Lady Rush, Mrs. W. Madocks, and Mrs. Taylor, defy our research. We can find nobody who knows them; we cannot suppose Lady Rush to be the old Lady who kept a day school in Beaufort-buildings, because the ei-devant instructress of females would hardly have flourished in the sullied pages of Brandenburgh House; but for the others, we conclude, like poor harmless Mrs. Hume, or the Duchess of Leinster, they have been the victims of domestic tyranny, which reigns no where so absolutely as in the houses of the advocates for freedom.

For Lady Sarah Butler we feel a respect, claimed from us by no other visitor of the Queen excepting two, the young Duchess we have just mentioned, who, as the daughter of the Earl of Harrington and the sister of Petersham, (whom every body loves for his good nature) draws largely upon our compassion, and the Countess of Jersey, who demands indulgence for her thousand pleasant qualities, and the particular influence under which she acted.

That Lady Sarah Butler never did visit the Queen we do not venture to affirm, because we have no positive assurance that she did not; but when it is known that her Ladyship is, and has been for some time labouring under a most painful illness, we think most of our readers will agree in believing that she never

We copy the following paragrah from the Dublin Patriot, received on Friday.

"We can state upon very high authority, that the visits of the Duchess of Leinster to her Majesty have been DISCONTINUED. Whether we have in any degree contributed to open the eyes of her Grace's illustrious husband to, we shall merely say, the impropriety of such visits, the public are left to judge. The fact we now state, however, may be depended on. None of Lord Harrington's unmarried daughters were visitors to her Majesty; nor, indeed, were any of the male branches of his Lordship's family suffered to act so

The Dublin Patriot is a very good Paper, but rather vain withal: we could tell them that Jons Bull has opened the Duke of Leinster's eyes; as we trust in God it will those of all others, who, in a moment of intemperate PARTY feeling, have sacrificed the respectability of their wives, by so shameful a degradation as forcing them to visit Brandenburgh

ORIGINAL POETRY.

STUPID MISTAKE. Sir Robert Wilson, K. M. T. What's that? says a Southwark Wight; La! Says his neighbour-don't you see?

[The above epigram, or whatever it is, we have inserted. to encourage a new correspondent; but we must accompany our condescension by a hint, that it is somewhat below the standard of poetry admissible into this paper. Our chief motive for allowing it to appear was, that it gave us an op-portunity of remarking, that the Mr. Wilson to whom it refers (who is moreover a Major-General in our service,) is no Knight at all, which we will undertake, in a number or two, to prove, to every body's satisfaction, but his own.]
J. B.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

TO EARL GREY.

My Lord.—I have no hesitation in affirming that a more barfaced display of political profligacy, a more daring outrage upon the feelings of the country, or a more insolent experiment upon its credulity, was never yet hazarded than in the speeches of Mr. Lambton and your Lordship, at the late Durham meeting.

Your Lordship may be startled at this style of address; but you must now prepare yourself for a stronger mode of remonstrance than that which you have hitherto been accustomed to. You have sanctioned the example of subjecting the highest powers to the rude animadversion of the lowest, and can have no pretence for an exception in your favour, and certainly no claim for forbearance on the parts of those who consider your policy equally doubtful on the score of integrity and of decency.

Your Lordship has no privilege to plead when you take your station on the same platform with the Hunts and Hobhouses. As a hustings orator, your pretensions are below those of even such men; and it would be difficult to prove, upon any common principle of justice, why the one should be exposed to so large a share of public obloquy, and the other be immured in Ilchester Gaol, whilst your Lordship feels yourself at liberty with impunity to pursue the same line, and are guilty of the same excesses for which they stand severally condemned.

Your Lordship is not entitled to the allowance which candour may extort from us, in favour even of these public disturbers; for whilst they honestly avow their hostility against the present order of things, and proceed without disguise to adopt means to overturn and subvert it, your Lordship, with less sincerity, but with more bitterness of zeal, labours to exasperate the people against their governors, in order to obtain the power you profess to decry. They may hope to gain something in a general scramble. Your Lord-ship has every thing to lose, and is little disposed to surrender the inheritance which has colaterally fallen to your lot, or to account for the cheaply-earned Titles and ample accumulation of the Martinico campaign which you inherit in a direct line! The most vehement and desperate of the Radical faction are not, therefore, chargeable with the hypocrisy of a talse pretence, and may claim some merit, at least for consistency, whilst your Lordship has not even this hollow ground for a footing. I leave the world to furnish a solution to the extraordinary phenomenon of the proudest and most imperious man in the kingdom, descending to court the lowest of the rabble, by sacrifices which have been thought to degrade even a Wood, a Peter Moore, a Wilson, or a Gerard Noel!

Your Lordship cannot suppose that any man above the very dregs of an ignorant and misled rabble, is deceived by your protestations in favour of the Queen's innocence. You are the single dupe of your own professions. Your conversations in society are as well known as your speeches in Parliament. Every man who has mixed in the world is aware of the authority yourself, my Lords Lansdowne, Erskine, Grosvenor, and Caernarvon, have afforded for establishing the moral guilt and turpitude of her, whom you uphold for political purposes, and declare, as honorable men, to be " pure and undefiled." Your anecdotes of her infamy, and the tradition of her folhies, have afforded the better parts of the symposia of Holland House, and Woburn Abbey. The Duke himself was able to afford the rare instance of adding to the entertainment of his guests, by the anecdotes of his own courier, and the orgies of the Barona, which left his Grace without horses to pursue his journey with the utmost expedition from the contagion of the Caroline court.

If we were to deny your Lordship the quality of Common Sense, instead of admitting (with respect for their perversion) that you are endowed with talents, equal at least to most of your own faction, and on that account were to suppose that after the most conclusive, and corroborating chain of evidence (AS MY LORD ERSKINE HIMSELF ADMITTED TO A FRIEND OF MY OWN,) that was ever produced in a court of justice; after it had remained untouched, and unconby witnesses broug tht over to at an immense expense; cherished and fed by the accused herself; and wholly under the influence of her counsel, who, with all these advantages did not dare to hazard even a denial of facts stated to have occurred in their presence; after the confirmation of the most criminal acts, by the admission of the only selected three of these persons; were it possible for us to suppose, I say, with all this vast and accumulated and undisturbed proof of guilt, that the obliquity of your Lordship's mind, were such as to exclude a conviction of the Queen's guilt from it, how shall we you allowed your wife to visit Brandenburgh House; and if you have not, what plea can or will you urge for a neglect, which, if the Queen be innocent, is not only to be regarded as a most indecent breach of established etiquette, but a direct violation of every principle of honour and humanity, by leaving the innocent oppressed victim of a foul and atrocious conspiracy (I take your Lordship's own statement of the case,) without the means of redeening the character she has lost, from the mere absence of respectable female society!

You withheld this, my Lord; you persevered in it; you admit and avow in private life (I speak from authority I can produce) her guilt; you shew it by your acts; and yet in words you proclaim the innocence of her, the justice of whose condemnation you have yourself so largely contributed to confirm; and you dare to charge upon the Ministers of your Sovereign, ave, my Lord, and upon your Sovereign himself, the crime of believing, what you cannot deny upon your honour, though you call upon the country to discredit it upon the faith of your political character. Shame, shame, my Lord Grey! can any thing be more profligate or abandoned, than to urge your countrymen to submit their wives and daughters to a degradation, to which even the necessity of a political crisis, and the very honour of your party, cannot prevail upon you to subscribe in your person or that of your family! Can any thing be more insulting to the feelings, more revolting to the principles of honourable minds, than the recommendation of an immoral act to others, to which you refuse yourself to become a party?

The pride of my Lord Grey has stooped to court the lowest of the rabble, that he may share its applause with the basest of mankind.

He has condescended to be the apologist of miscreants, who have held the torch to the very gates of the citadel; he has advocated the cause of adultery and moral turpitude; he has done all this, and more, to shew his implacable hatred to the Throne and to its ministers; but in his wild career he has stopt short, on the great principle of his life-self; and refuses, even to his party, and to his ambition, the sacrifice of himself and his family. The throne may perish, the institutions of the country may sink into annihilation; public affairs may still continue in the hands of men, whom he would in his hate destroy; but he cannot, he will not, submit Lady Grey or his daughters to the degradation of even leaving their names at the door of an Innocent Queen!!

TO JOHN BULL.

Sir-In the commencement of the interesting list of the Queen's female visitants, in your first number, I find, "Mrs. Beaumont, and the two Misses Beaumonts;" and you inform us, most truly, that they are the wife and daughters of John Thomas Barber, late a miniature painter, in Southampton-street, Covent-garden, who has assumed, "the Lord knows why," the name of Beaumont. You might have added, the Lord knows how; for the modo is, in fact, known only to the said J. T. Barber, and a very few others, by whom he probably hopes it may have been forgotten. But I will tell you how, and let J. T. Barber deny it if he can.

A very few years since, he applied to the Public Office, in which such processes are commenced, to offer a petition for his Majesty's Royal licence, to assume the sirname of a family in the highest rank of our nobility.

It is necessary to declare clearly, in such petitions, a reasonable and legal motive. This whimsical artist could produce no motive but his disgust to the unfortunate name of Barber; and so the office declined to forward his petition.

Conceiving, probably, that the refusal might have arisen from a consideration of the well-known splendour of the exalted patrician sirname which he had solicited, he returned again to the charge, with a second petition, for leave to assume that of Beaumont, one of the most ancient and honourable among the English gentry. Here, however, he was again repulsed. Was he of the blood of the Beaumonts? pulsed. ad any one of that name bequeathed an estate to him on condition of his assuming it? No. The only motive he had to state was, that he did not like to be called "Mr. Barber." Poor Mr. Barber now went home in a passion: and, as he could obtain no other licence, effected the alteration by the simple operation of his own will and pleasure; and, as the sphere in which he then moved, was very confined, little inquiry was made about it. He now (not to mention the captivating effect of such a name at the head of his daily invitations to insure at his shop) courts the mob by denouncing vengeance against his

TO JOHN BULL.

Sir-I approve very much of your spirited attack upon the Queen's visitors. Such an exposition cannot fail to do good. Perhaps you may think it worth while to ask why Mr. Brougham kept back Lord Liverpool's letter to the Queen, from the 15th of April till after her arrival in England?

I am, Sir, yours, PROBE.

TO JOHN BULL.

Sir-Having read in the London papers, that an Address to her Majesty, purporting to be from this town, was presented to her, on a late occasion, by the Honourable Member for Winchelsea, and conceiving that, without some explanation, more weight might be attached thereto than the case warrants, I beg leave to state, through your journal, a few facts, which I dare Mr. Brougham, or any of the addressers to contradict.

This Address then, which was meant to do the Queen so much honour, was hawked through the country far and wide; signatures were actually begged, schools were canvassed, public-houses were visited night after night, and day after day. The Address was represented, for a fortnight at least, to be lying for signatures at the office of a Radical printer in this town; and with all these efforts, extraordinary as they really were, not three merchants, not one banker, (with the exception of the father of the printer who got up the Address), not one clergyman, not one gentleman of the whole town, a town consisting of 18.000 inhabitants, could be found so forgetful of what was due to themselves, their wives, and daughters, as to sign this Address.

This is no exaggerated statement: I challenge contradiction. And am, Sir,

MISCELLANEOUS.

There is a great deal of literary talent in the illustrious House of Russell just now. The young Lords put forth their heavy quartos and their light octavos with the greatest alacrity. We understand that her Grace the Duchess of Bedford has been attacked with the caccelles scribendi, and has a work in the press, called a " A Journey to Vienna:" dedicated to Lord CLANWILLIAM. The motto is from Shakespeare-

"Give me my Meed, and I'll go back again!"
It has excited great expectations in the learned world. It may be remembered, that Lord Guilford being asked on the Queen's Trial, what sort of a donkey he rode about upon; answered-A Jackass. In commemoration of this stupid reply, all the donkeys at Brighton are now nick-named Guildfords.

On Monday evening next, Lady Davy's weekly Assemblies commence; her Ladyship's intention is to re-ceive her friends as well as the Members of the Royal Society: it is expected that her Ladyship's conver-sazioni will be brilliant and scientific; they are to terminate on the 1st June.

A report having got into circulation, that one of Alderman Wood's sons had been lost at Port Praya, we are requested to contradict it, the Alderman having no son abroad. We confess we never believed the story;—it is not likely that any of the Alderman's family should be drowned.

It is pleasant to see the effect which our paper has upon folly. In consequence of our remark upon Mr. Proctor's coxcombry in calling himself B rry Cornwall, we find the puff preliminary about his Play, in the Morning Post of Wednesday, announces it as being him Mr. Denotors "who has kitherto (that is till me by Mr. Proctor, " who has hitherto (that is, till we beat it out of him last Sunday (written under the name of Cornwall."

It is curious to remark, that in the confined circle of her Majesty's personal friends, there are few who have not been actually imprisoned for crimes and misdemea-nours. We have amongst others—

John Theiwail Newgate. Robert Wilson, Esq. Major-Gen. Paris. - Le Maitre Newgate Newgate. John Cam Hobbonse William Cobbett . Ditto. John Gale Jones

— Waddington Ditto, &c. &c. &c. House of Correction Not to speak of her Majesty's equally warm, though more distant partizans— Henry Hunt licheter. Richard Carlinle . Dorchester. Leigh Hunt Burdett Horsemonger-lane.

To shew that this is not the result of any persecution on her Majesty's account, it is only necessary to remark that she was in no way connected with their several disgraceful incarcerations: but it may be equally necessary to observe, that Mrs. Thelwall, a country actress, married to the person first named on the list, (who was tried for High Treason,) was the individual selected to present and read the first address to Her Majesty from the married LADIES of London. And that Mr. Le Maitre, who stood charged with inventing a machine for the purpose of murdering the late King, (for whom the Queen pretends so much affection,) was conviction of the Queen's guilt from it, how shall we courts the mob by denouncing vengeance against his the gentleman chosen to present an Address to Her account for your withholding the single testimony in friend Mr. Alderman Wood's drugging brewers, and Majesty, on the part of the Ward of Bishopsgate. ## PRINCE LEOPOLD.

The Times of Friday informs us, with triumphant effrontery, that "the attentions of Prince Leopold to the Queen continue unabated." Unabated they easily may be, for since his Serene Royal Highness's visit, in October last, we have never heard of any attention paid by him to the Queen: and that visit, so far from being an attention, was considered (and very justly) by the Queen as the blundering insult of a German purvenu; for on the very day on which it was paid, this Screne and dutiful Highness wrote a letter, it is said, to one of the Royal Family, who might be expected to shew it to the King, to say that he had paid the visit as a dry matter of duty to his late wife's mother, and not as any proof of his belief in the Queen's innocence.

The Queen who, to do her justice, has a spirit of her own, was naturally indignant at this "half-faced fellowship," and poor Prince Leopold got by his visit and his letter, nothing but the contempt of all parties.

If he has been, as the Times says, again admitted to the presence of the Queen and Count Vassali, it seems to authenticate a report which we have heard, that the Queen desired to treat with him for the hire of that palace (Malborough House) which the indulgent liberality of the nation has enabled him to occupy. But the Queen may spare herself the mortification of dealing with Prince Leopold for any such purpose; he dare not let her his House-he knows full well that the nation expects to see the SIXTY THOUSAND A YEAR. which he enjoys, expended in maintaining the dignity of his own station in a proper residence, and will never bear to behold the creature of their favour rivalling Mr. Robins in the trade of a house-broker.

We do not suspect Prince Leopold of any great delicacy, but we see that he is accompanied in his visits to the Queen by that Adonis, Colonel Addenbrooke, who, in addition to his great personal beauty, has the advantage of being a very prudent person, who could not fail to inform his Highness of the probable result of such a bargain.

THEATRICALS.

COVENT GARDEN. The Slave was performed here last night to a brilliant and fashionable audience. That most exquisite of drolls, Liston, is at all times irresistible, but we would seriously advise him to riot less in the luxuriance of his fun. The personal and private jokes of the actors amongst themselves, are, like half the good things in Blackwood, lost from being local or personal; and however piquante in their own circle, thrown away upon an audience for want of being understood. We have seen the whole effect of a scene destroyed by Liston's endeavours to make the other players laugh; and, to those who know his delightful face, it must be evident that those endeavours were in the end triumphantly successful. Who that ever saw the last scene of the Antiquary, remembers any thing about it, but Liston's extravagance, and poor Miss Stephens's trepidation and horror at being pinched and tickled, and being made to laugh whether she would or not.

Liston, however, is in his real element at the Haymarket, in that palace of mirth, where a man gives himself up to fun, and puts off the respectability of his intellect at the door, as he does his great coat in the winter theatre, he is monarch:-there, where the pieces in which he acts are mere vehicles for his performance, and are generally without plot, incident, or probability, the more he puts in of his own, and omits of his author, the more his audience benefit; for, if he does not introduce better dialogue than that furnished by the summer play-writers, the chances are an hundred to one against his making up worse.

We would venture to give a hint to another gentleman at this theatre, and that because we admire him much. We mean Mr. Macready: he appears to us to be falling into Kean's manuer: and the symptoms of this alteration from his own style have grown so frequent of late, that if we did not think too highly of Mr. Macready's talents and good sense to suspect him, we should be almost afraid that it was intentional. Mr. Macready, however free from vanity, must know himself well enough to know his own superiority over Kean; and it is quite beneath such a man to stoop to the imitation of an inferior, to gain the applause of that portion of the audience, who have established a never-fading testimony of their own bad taste, by their riotous admiration of deformity and vulgarity.

The Covent Garden Pantomime is excellent. The strength of Grimaldi, the Garrick of clowns, seems like that of wine, to increase with age; his absurdities are admirable. There is a life and spirit about the whole arrangement of this species of entertainment here, which is calculated not only to bewitch the little masters and misses, but even to amuse the children of larger growth.

Miss Stephens appears on Tuesday. We are glad to see that this lady and the proprietors have taken Miss Matthews, of Covent Garden Theatre, is married to the son of a Dean: what will the Bishop say?

We have had no report of the minor theatres. Se lect parties amuse themselves with plays during the cold weather in all parts of London, and its vicinity. St. George's Fields has its theatre—the Waterloo Bridge Road has its theatre-Wapping and Pancras have their theatres-Drury-lane boasts of two, Old Drury and the Olympic—the Strand affords us the Sans Pareil and the Lyceum. Covent Garden stands where it did; and operas are performed in the Argyle

It appears to us that there are enough of these places open now to please the enemies of monopoly, and to ruin most of the people concerned in them.

With Drury Lane we never mean to meddle—the wretched state the whole concern has been brought to under the auspices of that goose Peter Moore, excites compassion rather than anger; but the coolness with which they act tragedies, without one tolerable player, is perfectly comical. What an idea of a London audience Mr. Elliston must have, now that he is not in the habit of seeing them, to suppose that they could endure Pizzaro as acted last week. The play, identified with the Kembles, Mrs. Siddons, Mrs. Jordan, and all our best performers, was done last Tuesday, by Messrs. Barnard, Cooper, Wallack, and Booth.

Mr. Barnard is a very useful actor—he sings, dances, acts tragedy, comedy, farce, or pantomine; and really, without meaning a joke, is equally respectable in all: but Mr. Cooper, transformed by the classical air of Liverpool, from an underling at the Haymarket, to the hero of poor old Drury; and Mr. Wallack, who has lost, by his association with American vulgarity, all he had gained before he left England, are, in themselves, repellents strong enough to keep away the least fastidious audience in the world. And when to these is super-added Mr. Marc Antony Liberius Booth, who can wonder that there are seldom half a hundred persons in the theatre.

Mr. Booth, who is endowed with all Mr. Kean's faults and deformities, without one redeeming quality, is (always excepting Elliston himself,) the most illustrious specimen of the ridiculous in Tragedy, now living. He is in truth what George Colman said in anger, of rather a better actor; a Lusus Natura, and were he sewed up in a skin to act a Hog in a pantomime, he would act a Hog with six legs better than a hog with four.-We wish the experiment had been tried in Harlequin Esquimaux, as in that case one might have been provoked into a laugh. As it is, the greatest pleasure likely to be afforded to the poor children who are taken to see it, will be found in a nap not quite so comfortable as that which they would enjoy in their own beds at home.

BOW STREET OFFICE.

An Intrusive Remark .- Dr. Y-, a physician of emi-AN INTRUST REMARK.—Dr. Y.—, a physician of eminence, applied to the sitting Magistrate respecting the conduct of a young woman who having formerly lived as a servant in his family, was ever since continually annoying him with what he considered threats to extort money. The doctor read several of her letters, when a little, fat, red-face, man, who had been listening very attentively to his narrative, jumps up and exclaims, "Why, sir, I believe you seduced her!"

"Seduced her! Good G.—d. Ma sir y.—Pray sir do you

"Seduced her! Good G—d! Me, sir?—Pray sir, do you know the young woman?" exclaimed the astonished Doctor, whitst every eye was turned upon the fat mysterions little stranger, who cooly replied, "I do know her?"

"And pray what was she, sir?"

"She was the daughter of a elergyman—at least you have just told us so."

It now appeared, that this queer little fellow knew nothing whatever of the affair or the parties; he said his name was Mister James Young; he was an independant gentleman, and a freeholder of the county of Middlesex, and as such he thought he had a right to express his opinion on any subject. whatsomever.—" Not in this particular place." rejoined Sir Robert Baker, "and unless you are silent you will not be suffered to remain."

With respect to the subject of the Doctor's complaint, the Magistrates were of opinion, that the woman's conduct was beneath his notice: that in fact no criminal threat had been held out.

The practice of bands of music of various instruments serenading the inhibitants, for some time previous to Christmas Day, in the night time, as a matter of rejoicing on the approaching occasion, is very general throughout this country. In London they are purchases, and are filled by very respectable persons: in Westminster they are appointed by the High Steward and Court of Burgesses. In the latter place it was held by appointment from that Court by a person of the name of Clay, on whose death a Mr. Munro applied to the Court to succeed him, and was appointed. He employed a number of persons in different parts of Westminster ployed a number of persons in different parts of Westminster to serenade the inhabitants, trusting to their liberality at Christmas for a remuneration; but he learnt that a number of other parties were going about unauthorized; and as the time was approaching for collecting Christmas-boxes, he applied on Friday to Sir R. Baker for his assistance to enable him to suppress such intrusions upon his rights, and to prevent them collecting Christmas-boxes.

Sir Robert Baker candidly confessed his ignorance that such appointment or power was vested in the Court of Burgesses: however, Mr. Munro convinced him of the correct. ness of his statement, by producing a warrant signed by Mr. Furley, the Deputy Town Clerk, and also a silver badge with the Westminster arms engraven on it. Sir Robt. Baker then promised to assist him.

Perry the constable apprehended three of this description of performers, in Brewer-street, and dispersed a band of 28, who were performing in Berkeley-square, on Christman morning,—Five of the latter, with the three apprehended, appeared next day at the office, when Sir Robert Baker told the men in custody that if they collected money as the Waits or Wakes of the City and Liberty of Westminster, they or Wakes of the City and Liberty of Westminster, they would be obtaining money under false pretences: he admit ted that they might collect Christmas boxes in their own individual names, but not as Westminster Waits.

Imposton.—On Friday, Mr. Humby, a respectable Surgeon and Apothecary, of Jermyn-street, St. James's-street, attended before Sir Robert Baker, the Sitting Magistrate, attended before Sir Robert Baker, the Sitting Magistrate to lodge a complaint against a gross impostor, who had introduced himself to a number of his patients, consisting of families of the highest respectability, to whomhe represented himself as the particular friend of Mr. Humby, the complainant, and that he was recommended to their notice by him. He introduced himself to the families as posessing a bim. He introduced himself to the families as posessing a superior knowledge in the performance of slight of hand tricks, or a conjuror of supe ior rank to what that class of men generally are, and at most of the houses, by his consummatic assurance and pretending to be intimately acquainted and recommended, he has been allowed to perform his exhibitions, and by these means to obtain money. Sir Robt. Baker promised Mr. Humby every possible assistance to discover the impostor, and to bring him to condign punishment for impositions and mal-practices.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

BEDALE .- An extensive fire broke out last week in the mill of Mr. Prest, of Musham; after burning for some time with unabating fury, the roof fell in with a tremendous grash, and the whole of this extensive building, which was thirty yards in length, ten in breadth, and five stories in height, soon became a mass of snoking ruins, nothing but the bare walls being left. The loss amounts to £10,000.

Mr. Prest was only insured in the Norwich Union Office for £4,500. It is supposed the machinery in the mill had been overheated, which caused the fire.

Bury.—A melancholy accident occurred last week; as Mr. W. Mann, a respectable soap-boiler, and Mr. Smith, a farmer, both of Glomeford, were returning from our market a farmer, both of Glomsford, were returning from our market a a ope horse chaise, they found on their approach to Glemsford bridge, (owing to the rain) the waters were out and exercised y deep: they ventured in and the horse soon stop on which both gentlemen quitted the chaise with the hopes of retracing their steps, but Mr. Mann was carried off by the carrent and drowned. Mr. Smith, by swimming, and the assistance of a rope which was thrown to him, was dragged to land. The body of Mr. Mann was found in a few days after: there were four hundred bounds in notes in his pocket.

The hawk escaped without.

BATH.—As Mr. Broderip was returning from the city on staturday evening, he was attacked by three footpads, who robbed him of his pocket-book, containing between seven and eight pounds, and some silver. The villains beat him so cruelly that his life is despaired of.

BROWNON.—Dec. 27. The arrival of our beloved Soverleign has diffused pleasure and satisfaction. His Majesty was met on the road, near Preston, and thence followed to the palace, by a numerous confluence of the inhabitants of this palace, by a numerous confinence of the inhabitants of this place, on horseback and in carriages and on foot: in the carriages were many elegant females with purple favours in their bosoms—the gentlemen with similar symbols of toyalty and affection attached to their desses. The loyal tishermen, anxious to evince their attachment to their beloved Sovereign on the occasion, manned a large tilted wherean, having hoisted the national flag, when a switchle waggen, having hoisted the national flag, upon a suitable support, at the stern of it, and placed three pieces of mount. es cannon in the body of the roomy vehicle, the muzzles of which appearing through the tilt had somewhat the resemwhich appearing through the tilt had somewhat the resemblance of great guns projecting from the broadside of a ship of war. A band of music, colours, &c. gave harmony, military shew, and brilliance, to the scene generally, while pleasure beamed in every eye, and made known the actual qualities of every heart. One soul of enthusiasm animated all present; and if ever there appeared a loyal accordance To sentiment, without any the slightest alloy of a different character, it may truly be said to have existed in this instate. The arrival of the Sovereign, at the e-rliest, had not been expected before three o'clock in the afternoon; and as the probability was that it would be much later, flambeanx were provided to be at hand, should they be needed. Contrary to the expectation, however, his Majesty and suite appeared on the road about fifteen minutes after two o'clock, before the order of the procession had been arranged, and though comparatively confused to what had been intended, ardent, animated, and enthusiastic, was the scene which ensued. The band struck up the national anthem, the colours were raised, then lowered to the ground, the huzzas were simultaneous and inspiriting, while the great guns from the seaman's car mingled their loyal thunder with the joyous roar predominant. The Monarch, with diguified condescension, bowed to the delighted popu ace, and "Long live King George the Fourth, God bless our King," was "floated in air from all points of the compass." The illuminations in the town in the evening were general.

Camerence. A most fatal event took place on Monday, the 25th instant. at Wimpole, the seat of the Earl of Hardwick. Lord Pollington, Mr. Cocks, and Mr. H. Lindsay, with his son, being in the woods shooting, the gun of Mr. Lindsay's son went off accidentally, by which unfortunate circumstance a young man of the name of Albin, acting as gamekeeper, lost his life, the contents of the gun having entered his head, which produced instant death. The Coroner's Inquest has been held, and have returned their verdict. Accidenial Death.

Accidenial Death.

Oumberland.— The Earl of Lonsdale, on Thursday seemight; St. Thomas's Day, ordered to be distributed to the peor of the neighbourhood of Lowther Castle, upwards of 1,400 pounds weight of prime beef, together with a great quantity of biankets and wearing apparel. The poor of Lowther are regularly supplied with soup from the Castle throughout the Winter.

DEVONSHIRE.—We are extremely sorry to at the that the Devonshire Bank, which has hitherto maintained, and we befieve justly, a respectable name, was under the necessity, on Wednesday last, of suspending its payments. The cause is attributed to unfounded and malicious reports and anony-mous letters derogatory to the credit of that establishment, and which naturally produced an immediate run on it as extensive as unexpected. A reward is offered for the propagators of such stories, which it is hoped will be successful, and the bank resume its payments. The proprietors confidently assert that they have ample means to fulfil their engagements to the fullest extent.

Holl.-Captain Wilson, of the sloop Harmony, was un fortunately drowned off this place on Saturday se'nnight. The vessel was making the harbour mouth, on her passa e to Grimsby, when the wind blowing fresh at the time, he was precipitated everboard and lost before assistance could be rendered. The Grimbsby Custom-house boat, containing n. it is feared is lost.

DUPLIN.—A filthy wretch in a red jacket, who frequents blertion-square, in this city, observing an elderly lady alway, implored charity in the name of all the saints of the calcudar, vowing to God if she did not give him a tenpenny, hermosid that day, be driven to do a deed his nature shuddered at; yet he would do it before sunset. Alarmed at his situation, the plous old lady, imagining he meditated pray, my poor friend, what is it you would have been driven to dep?" "Ah, my lady!" said the arch wag, towing up the temperary, "I should have been driven to work for the bit, which I won't please God, while this holds, any how?"

MANCHESTER.—On the night of Sunday week an assaud nation took place in Oldfield-lane , Salford. Two men named Fletcher and Fielding, who had been drinking in a public-house together, quarrelled, and, in consequence of some words used by the latter. Fletcher determined to murder Fielding. He concealed himself accordingly in a dark lane through which Fielding had to pass, and, on his approach plunged a knife into his body. He shortly afterwards expired. The murderer has been committed to take his trial his trial.

Norminguam.-On Thursday week, as Alderman Barber was conversing with a gentleman in his shop, some villains discharged a pistol at him, charged with slugs, which struck the wall within two yards of the Alderman. A reward of two hundred guineas is offered for the apprehension of the villain who fi.ed the pistol.

Parszzy.—On Saturday evening there was an infernal attempt to murder one of the partners, who is manager of the Underwood Cotton Mill, in this town. This attempt was made so early as a quarter-past ten o'clock, and under circumstances peculiarly daring. Inquiry had been made for him at six or seven different places in the course of the evening, and at the time above mentioned, he was found at the house of a friend in Causeyside-street, one of nearly the most public streets in Paisley. The person who called for him was requested by the servant to step into a parlour, which the assassin declined, pleading urgent business. The gentleman had scarcely reached the threshold of the street door, when he was saluted by a discharge of loaded pistols, but most providentially without receiving any injury. Four bullets have since been found, one of which had struck the door, the other three were found in the lobby. The assassins were four in number, who instantly made off. Three men have been apprehended on suspicion, and a precognition has since been going on.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

DREADFUL FIRE, - About a quarter past eight o'clock on Saturday night a fire broke out in the warehouse belonging to Mr. John Barber, Paper Manufacturer, Baldwin's-place, Baldwin's-gardens, Gray's-inn-lane. The fire was so very rapid in its effects, that in less than a half an hour the whole of the building was burned to the ground. There were no persons in the house when the fire broke out, nor is it known ho wit happened. Several engines arrived in a short time and being well worked, and plentifully supplied with water, prev d the fire from communicating to the adjoining houses, or to the paper mill, which was a short distance across the yard. The mill with all the machinery was destroyed by fire about three years ago; we did not learn whether it was insured or not.

AWFUL INSTANCE OF SUDDEN DEATH .- Wednesday night last Mr. Stroud, residing in King Street, Seven Dials, after cating h ssupper, retired to his chamber; the following morning, not coming from thence at his usual time, Mr. Long, a person residing in the house, proceeded thither, when he found the deceased with his clothes on, lying on the bed quite dead. Mr. Stirling, the Coroner, on Thursday held an inquest on the body, and a verdict of "died by the visitation of God," was recorded.

DREADFUL SUICIDE.—An inquest was held at the sign of the Gower Arms, Gower-street, Bedford-square, before T. Stirling, esq. Coroner, on the body of John Griffiths, aged 35, late in the service of Sir Robert Warren, where he was frequently attacked by serious indisposition. The deceased resided in Gower Mews, and being left by himself in his apartment, he contrived to procure a case knife, with which he intlicted a most dreadful woun; on his throat. About eight o'clock on Thursday morning, he was found weltering in his blood, and the deadly instrument lying by his side.

The Jury returned a verdict:—" That the deceased committed the act, being at the time in a state of insanity."

MELANCHOLY CIRCUMSTANCE.—Some weeks ago a most diabolical attack was made on Miss Ann Craigy, a young lady about seventeen, who lived with her friends on Bermondsey-wall; which has produced consequences of a very afflicting nature. A boy knocked at the door of Mr. Craigy's house, and on Miss C's opening it, the villain, immediately running off, threw a cat in her face, by whose talons it was shockingly lacerated. The fright of this unexpected violence, produced strong fits, which lasted two days and nights, and with which she was afterwards at intervals afflicted. On Christmas-day, the family, whilst at dinner, were thrown into the greatest alar by the unfortunate young woman being seized with madness, which she exhibited by biting her arms, snapping at whatever came near her, and making hidecus noises, which increased to that degree, that it was deemed necessary to have a strait waistcost put on her; and, shocking to relate, she still continues in this deplorable state; the means usually adopted in such cases have been applied, but as yet prove ineffectual. The perpetrator of this wanton act has hitherto evaded apprehension.

Monday ever g an attempt to set fire to the premises of Mr. Englehart, a respectable cabinet-maker, residing at Limebouse, was made for the purpose of committing robbery. The following means were resorted to for this purpose:—Some fellows knocked at the door, and equired if a person who m they named resided there; on the girl an-swering in the negative, they desired to see Mr. Englehart kimself, and when the girl went to call him, they let loose a large cat, with a lighted torch tied to its bind quarters, and left the house. The affirighted animal immediately flew through the passage to the workshop at the back of the house; in this place a large quantity of timber, shavings, &c. are deposited, to which the torch immediately communicated, and the whole was instantly in a biaze. Proper means were immediately resorted to, and the fire was fortu-nately extinguished without doing any serious injury. It is, however, to be regretted, that the villains effected that, for which no doubt, their infamous plan was attended, as in the confusion a great number of persons entered the house, and a valuable watch and appendages were taken from the shelf; several silver table and other spoons from a closet, and a new great coat, with two umbrellas, were also stolen Mr. E. has signified his intention of offering a reward for the offenders.

The first intention of this Publication was formed several years ago, and then amounced to the Public through the medium of the Quarterly Review. At that period, an ample collection of materials for the work was made, with great assiduity and care, and a very great expence incurred towards its speedy completion.

Circumstances, wholly uniateresting to the Public, have retarded the Publication till now.

It is intended to reprint, in the present form, Works of the best of the English Novelists, together with selections from the German, French, and Italian, (some of which are already translated, and others in the course of translation,) with Memoirs of the Authors' Lives, and Criticisms on their Writings, prefixed. The Works of each Author will be published separately and complete, in a single volume, as in the present instance, or in two or more, as the length of

It is not the Publisher's intention to enlarge, either on the value of his materials, the correctness of the typography, or the beautiful execution of his work. The high source from whence he derives his Literary aid, will be at once recognized; and the present Volume is offered as a specimen of the style in which all the others will be executed.

* Smollett's Works will be published in March

On Saturday next will be published, the First Number of THE BEACON, air Edinburgh Weekly News PAPER.—It shall be the object of this Publication PAPER.—It shall be the object of this Publication to disseminate constitutional principles on political subjects. It claims the support of every one who thinks that the present system of Government is that by which his privileges are most effectually guarded, both from the aggression of power, and from the dangers of anarchy. Those who have already heard, at so much length, the advocates of another cause, cannot refuse to learn from the Press, what is to be said in favour of a system which has been reviled at the very time when the Country has been matained by its energy. time when the Country has been sustained by its energy, and exalted by its wisdom.

The Beacon will be printed by Duncan Stevenson, Parliament-stairs, and published every Saturday, at No. 210, High-street, where orders and communications may be ad-

The price of each Number will be 10d. 21. 5s. yearly, when delivered in Town, or sent post-free to any part of the Country; 21. 2s. when called for; and 21. 2s. if paid in advance.—Half year and quarter in proportion.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS DEC. 27.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES, Dec. 26.—The Chamber proceeded to ballot for five Candidates for the Presidency; the result was, for M. Ravez, 236; M. Bellart, 221; De Bonald, 217; Benoist, 212; De Bouville, 199; Royer Colard, 80; Courvoisier, 71; Dupont de l'Eure, 51; Lafitte, 47, &c. The first five having seals as a least the Candidates and the Candidates for the Presidency the Pres each an absolute majority, were declared the Candi-

A grand deputation was appointed to compliment the King on the New Year.—The Chamber resolved itself into a Secret Committee, to receive the Report of the Committee appointed to prepare an Address to the King. The address, after debate, was agreed to, and a grand Deputation appointed to present it to his Majesty.

PARIS. DEC. 31.—Thursday the King received the grand Deputation of the Chamber of Peers with their Address. The Deputation was ushered into the Royal Maria of the Commoning all presence by the Grand Master of the Ceremonies, attended by his assistants.

His Majesty gave the following answer to the Address (which was purely one of Congratulation:)

"I receive with a lively sensibility this expression of the sentiments of the Chamber of Peers; I see with real satisfaction the conformity of their principles with my own. I have said, and I repeat it, if I desire to have my days prolonged, it is to strengthen the institutions which I have given to my people. But, whatsoever may be the decrees of Providence, let us not forget this maxim of our public law. 'In France the King never dies.'

The state of the King's health appears to be very satisfactory.

The King held a Council of Ministers on Wednesday, at which the new Ministers, M. Laine, Villele, nesuay, at which the new Ministers, M. Laine, Villele, and Corbieres, were present.

The Viscount de Chateaubriand, Ambassador to the Court of Prussia, set out on Wednesday for Berlin.

A German Mail, with Frankfort papers to the 25th December, has arrived. There is a long article in the Austrian Observer, which consists in little more than giving the "lie direct" to various statements and runours respecting the Congress of Transmitter. mours respecting the Congress of Troppau, in the Vrai Liberal, a Netherland Journal. The most curious circumstance in this attack and contradiction is, that the most of the imputed fabrications have long since reached this country as intelligence of Austrian origin, dated from Vienna.

The intelligence from Naples is interesting: viz. the departure of the King for the Congress at Lay-bach. It was not without reluctance and distrust that the Parliament consented to the departure of the King. The letter of the Sovereigns was communicated to the King in a very respectful mode. It was presented to him at a solemn audience by the resident Ministers of England, France, Austria, Russia, and Prussia. The place of meeting, and the avenues leading to it, were crowded. The public manifested the utmost decorum, and the most entire confidence in the Parliament. The Parliament postponed its answer to the Message to the next day, the 8th of December. Next day again the Parliament Chamber was filled and surrounded by crowds of anxious spectators. A committee had been appointed to prepare an answer to the message. This Message, it will be recollected, contained specific bases of a Constitution, which the King pledged himself to maintain at the Congress. The answer of the Congress and approved of with acclaimance. Committee was read and approved of with acclamation. It declared that the Spanish Constitution must alone be the Constitution of Naples—that this and no other had been sworn to by the King, the people, the military and civil powers—and that the Parliament had not power to consent to the departure of the King, except upon the understanding that his departure should have for its object the support of the Spanish Constitution, sworn to by all.

The declaration of the King to his Parliament contains the following sentence:

"I declare I will not go to Laybach, except for the purpose of maintaining the Spanish Constitution.

After this declaration, I desire that the Parliament will decide, in positive terms, whether they will consent to my being present at the Congress at Laybach." The Parliament at last consented to the King's departure. He demanded the company and assistance of four members. The Parliament declined—relying solely upon his Royal faith, and his affection for his people.—The departure of the King was affecting.—He was escorted by multitudes to the shore—greeted the whole way with the kindest expressions.—He had arrived at Leghorn, and had lodgings prepared for him at Florence on the 19th, on his way to Laylach. His suite was numerous, amoug whom no diplomatic per-son is mentioned.—It is stated, however, that the Duke de Gallo was to join him at Laybach.

MADRID, DEC. 21.—Every thing in this city is still tranquil, and the new order of things is daily more and more consolidated .- A courier is just arrived from Cadiz, with very unpleasant intelligence of a serious misunderstanding between the Magistrates and in these movements; but the immense number of smugglers and persons without honest occupation, who infest this town, rendered the riots at one time very serious. To give a colour to their actions the insurgents prepared a formal document, which they have forwarded to the King, complaining of the conduct of the Magistrates, who have, say they, discharged the authors of the late massacres from prison without trial. The Magistrates have addressed a counter-statement to his Majesty, and there the matter rests for the moment.

The King is in perfect health, but in low spirits, on account of the disturbed state of the provinces, and the suspicion with which he is still regarded.

Geneva, Dec. 24.—The Grand Council of Bern opened its Sittings on the 18th. The public accounts for 1819 were received, and a considerable deficiency was ascertained.

The following are the particulars of a remarkable law-suit, as published by the defendant, Colonel Zelweger, whose residence is at Gall. He heard, about two years ago that he was charged by public rumour, with having committed incest many years since. He went before the Judge of the place, and demanded that an inquiry should be set on foot. He was sent before the Special Commission, who examined all the parties. In the course of the examination it was discovered that the report had been spread by a discarded chambermaid, a native of Baden. The Commission was satisfied; but nevertheless, gave an order of attachment upon the property of the Colonel; allowing him, however, six months to justify himself in. Mr. Zelweger accordingly instituted a process against the chambermaid, in the Court of Justice in Rastadt. The chambermaid there made a solemn protestation of guilt, as a calumniatrix. The Grand Council of Appenzel, in Switzerland, however, refused to receive this justi-fication, and condemned Mr. Zelweger to pay a fine of 3,000 Louis d'ors, (3,000l. sterling.) for having carried his cause into a Foreign Court. The sentence adds, We refuse to enter into the merits of the original accusation against Mr. Zelweger, but order him to be imprisoned, and hereby sequestrate his property for the said fine of 3,000 Louis d'ors."

THE QUEEN.

It not being distinctly understood by the generality of readers in what manner the House of Lords voted in the various stages of inquiry into the Queen's conduct while living abroad as Princess of Wales, it is here brought into a small compass:—

In consequence of the report of the Secret Committee of the Lords being taken into consideration on the 4th of July, stating, that they had "examined with all the attention due to so important a subject, the documents which have been laid before them, and they find that those documents contain allegations supported by the concurring testimony of a great number of persons in various situations of life, and residing in different parts of Europe, which deeply affect the honour of the Queen, charging her Majesty with an adulterous connection with a foreigner, originally in her service in a menial capacity, and attributing to her Majesty a continued series of condact highly unbecoming her Majesty's rank and station, and of the most licentious character. These charges appear to be calculated so deeply to affect not only the honour of the Queen, but also the dignity of the Crown, and the moral feeling and honour of the country, that in their opinions it is indispensable that they should become the subject of a solemn enquiry, which it appears to the Committee may be best effected in the course of a Legislative proceeding; the necessity of which they can-not but most deeply deplore." And all attempts on the part of the Committee of Lords and Commons to prevail on the Queen to accede to the wishes of Government to accept of the terms offered her of 50,000l. per annum, provided she lived abroad, and that she should be acknowledged as Queen at any Court in Italy that she thought proper to name, having failed: a motion was made on the 18th August, 1820, to call in Counsel to proceed on the inquiry, when the votes stood as

For the Question Against it

Majority infavour of it After avery minute enquiry, and hearing the defence of the Queen, which occupied forty-nine days, the question was put on the 6th November for the second reading of the Bill, when the votes stood as follows:

For the Question - 123

Against it

Majority in favour of it - 28.

The Bill then went into a Committee of the whole House, and as several Peers and Bishops, from religious scruples, had given their votes for the second reading upon the express understanding that, when the Bill went to a Committee, the Divorce clause would be excluded, which would leave only the degradation of her Majesty from the rank of Queen, and being considered the first female in the united kingdoms; Ministers, with the view of meeting the wishes of those Peers, expressed a desire to exclude the divorce clause, in which they were not supported by many of Peers who had voted for the second reading, in full conviction that the Queen disgraced herself while residing abroad as Princess of Wales, and that it would therefore be derogatory to the dignity of the Crown, to suffer her to remain as the Consort of the King, the people, the latter of whom paraded the streets in bodies, and called out for vengeance upon the authors of the massacres which took place in March last. Very few of the respectable inhabitants took any part the difference in opinion in those Peers who voted for the second reading, and under the plea of consistency for not allowing a degraded Queen to remain the Consort of the King, urged the propriety of retaining the divorce clause in the Bill, in the full expectation that on the third reading of the Bill the majority would be so much reduced in consequence of the religious scruples of a certain number of Peers and Bishops who would vote against it, that government would be obliged to give up the Bill; and in the event of its being sent down to the House of Commons, it would be thrown out, upon the same religious scruples, or that of inexpediency, as it having been avowed that the King had no disposition to marry again, the divorce clause became quite unnecessary.

On the 9thof November a division took place on the exclusion of the divorce clause, when there appeared—thereby placing Government in the minority; the con-sequence of which was, that on the 10th November, the fifty-third day of the trial, when the Bill was read a third time. Government lost the support of twelve Peers and Bishops upon religious principles, who had supported the second reading of the Bill, viz:—

For the Question Againstit 99 Majority for it in which division Government lost twelve votes, which were equal to seventeen votes against them, viz :-

Five votes that voted for retaining the Divorce Clause, which increased the number of the opposition from 94 to 99, being equal to 10 lost by Government 10 Seven votes, that did not vote on either side Total To this add the real majority, being

The majority would have stood at - 26.
The Bill was, however, read a third time by a sufficient majority; but on the motion of Lord Liverpool the question of the passing the Bill was ordered to be put on that day six mouths.

Against the abandonment of the Bill, the following Protests were entered :---

I.—Protest entered on Saturday, 11th Nov. 1820.

" DISSENTIENT, "Dissentient,
"Because no sufficient ground appears for the abandonment of the Bill founded upon the charges againsther Majesty the Queen, which had undergone the most solemn and accurate investigation; charges in which the morality of the country was deeply interested, and in which all the Peers, Spiritual and Temporal, who delivered their opinions, with very few exceptions, declared their conviction of her guilt; and the abandonment of which is a dereliction which may bring into disrespect not only the character of our highest court of judicature, but that of the nation itself. And it is with the greatest concern we observe the extreme want of consideration for the Sovereign, by the dereliction of proceedings so necessarily brought on, by which a wife declared by the House of Peers to have been guilty of adulterous intercourse with a menial servant, and of a conduct the most deprayed, with a mental servant, and of a conduct the most deprayed, is to remain Queen Consorf, thus lowering the dignity of the crown, and embarrassing the country with far greater difficulties than those which seem to have induced his Majesty's Government to relinquish the prosecution of the Bill.

"Because this appears to us to have been the more fit in a case, in which so many Peers, who voted against the third case, in which so many Peers, who voted against the third reading of the bill, had declared their conviction that the guilt imputed had been proved.

"Because we also think that the House ought not, in considering whether the bill should passafter its having been read a third time, to have been influenced by any regard to what might take place in an enquiry in the other House of Par-liament, as was suggested in the course of our debates, save only that we deem it to have been just that the party ac-only that we deem it to have been just that the party accused should have had an opportunity of calling for the judgment of both houses, when the house, proceeding by a bill of pains and penalties, had expressed in its resolutions a judgment unfavourable to the party.

" WILLIAM (Duke of Clarence.)"

Every person who took pains to inform himself of the sentiments of the Queen's pretended friends, or rather of their plan for turning out the present ministers, and providing for themselves and relations, must have been made sensible that they built their hopes upon being able to procrastinate the investigation in the House of Commons for a lengthened period, and by violent speeches in the same keep up a ferment in the country, so as to procure petitions against the divorce clause, as being contrary to the religious principles of the country, and thereby be able ultimately to get the Bill thrown out. Government being sensible of the plans laid for keeping up a ferment in the country. very prudently determined to disappoint the Opposi-tion, which they did most effectually by setting the Bill aside, the news of which acted upon the party like an electric shock, as it at once deprived them of the hope of any longer deluding the mob by violent speeches in the House, in favour of the Queen; and that such was their plan was made manifest by their conduct in the House of Commons on the 23d of November, when the Usher of the Black Rod entered and sum-moned them to appear in the House of Lords.

The Party have now done their utmost in support of their puppet the Queen; and when the people have had time to cool, and had an opportunity of gaining accurate information, they will then see how much they have been deluded.

The Peers who entered their Protest (as above stated) against the setting aside the Bill, may ere long have reason to approve of the prudent and judicious plan of Government, as all that was originally wished by them has been obtained, viz.—the proving by a public and most solemn inquiry upon oath the guilt of the Queen, as having disgraced herself while living abroad as Princess of Wales, which fully authorized them in not including her name in the Liturgy as Queen of England, and preventing her sullying the Throne.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

MONUMENT TO THE LATE KING .- It gives us real pleasure to learn that the commencement of the New Year is to be distinguished by an act of public justice to the memory of a Sovereign, whose reign must always be ranked as one of the most eventful in the British Annals, and of whose virtues there is, we believe, but one opinion among men of all parties and classes—we mean his late revered Majesty George III.! The plan of an appropriate monumental groupe to be executed in bronze, and be erected in some public place, in commemoration of his Majesty, has been submitted by an eminent Artist to the principal Members of the tinguished for their taste in the Fine Arts. It has met with the most flattering approbation, and a Committee of Noblemen and Gentlemen has been formed, with the sauction of the highest authority, and under the immediate patronage of his Royal Highness the Duke of York, to carry the plan into immediate execution.

Prince Leopold's visits to the Queen, it is now said, have relation only to a bargain which he is making with her for Marlborough-house.

The river is at present to much impeded by the severe frost, and large quantities of ice, as scarcely to be navigable above Richmond Bridge. The watermen have dragged all their boats on shore, to prevent their being damaged by the ice.

HOUSELESS POOR.—On Thursday, a Meeting of the General Committee of the Houseless Poor was held in the Poultry, for the purpose of receiving a report of the arrangements made at the London Workhouse. From a statement made by the Chairman of the House Committee, (D. Campbell, Esq.) it appeared that upwards of 100 persons were sheltered on Wednesday night; and from the regulations laid down, (which are the result of repeated consultations during the summer) the Committee are satisfied that none but the "really houseless" have been, or are likely to be re-ceived under their care.—A remarkable occurrence took place here on Wednesday night:—A man named Woolf, who had committed a felony in a distant part of the country, fled to London, and a reward was offered for his apprehension. A sailor, who was acquainted with the circumstances, as well as with the person of the delinquent, pursued him. Both were in a state of destitution, and by a singular coincidence, both sought shelter at the London Workhouse. The offender was of course recognized, and as the Committee have Police Officers in constant attendance, he was immediately taken into custody.

Whilst in the metropolis we have been entirely free from snow, until Friday, we find by our letters, that there has been a most heavy fall in different parts of the country. At Brighton, the depth of snow is re-markably great; and in other parts the snow has been so heavy as to render the roads nearly impassable, it having drifted to the height of nine or ten feet.

Wonderful Undertaking.—The following is an attempt at a pedestrian exploit exceeding all other un-dertakings of the kind. Mr. Wyat, a Bedfordshire farmer, started from the City Road, on Monday to go on foot 322 miles in five days, which is at the rate of 65 miles per day. Time is backed 2 and 3 to 1.

A meeting has been held at Stratford-upon-Avon, for the purpose of erecting, by subscription, a monument to the memory of the immortal chakspeare.

A letter from the agent to Lloyd's, at Autwerp, dated 29th Dec. says—"The frost has set in very severely, and the navigation of the Scheldt is stopped by the floating ice. The Active, Spellard, from hence for Alicant and Barcelona, laye in a precurious situation of Pales in shore." ation off Batz, in shore."

Duez.—On Tuesday morning a meeting took place in the Regent's Park, between Captain J—, of the Royal Navy, and Mr. H——an independent Gentle-. man, residing in the neighbourhood of Portsman-square. The parties arrived at the ground, attended by their seconds, a short time after eight o'clock, when every endeavour was made to effect an amicable adjustment, but without success. The distance (12 paces) was then measured, and the gentlemen fired, when Mr. H——, received the ball of his antagonist in his left shoulder; he was immediately conveyed tohis residence. This disagreement took place on the preceding evening, at a tavern, in the neighbourhood of Bond-street, in consequence of Mr. H—— using some strong language, reflecting upon the late Lord Nelson.

A person calling himself Captain, alias the Rev. Mr. Swann, was taken into custody a few days since, on various charges of fraud. His sister, who passed for his wife, was taken into custody on Monday, in the neighbourhood of Uxbridge, for obtaining goods by false pretences, under the reigned name of Barrington. She took a house, and passed herself off as the relative of Lady C——, and got goods from town and country, to the tune of more than 100l. which she turned into money, and decamped.

The high Sheriff of the county of Kent, Sir Thomas Dyke has refused to call a meeting of the County for the purpose of addressing the Queen.

Yesterday se'nnight, Thomas Stevens, Esq. was elected Recorder of the city of Exeter, in the room of W. Cour-tenay, Esq. M. P. who has resigned.

On Thursday a Meeting, purporting to be of the Inhabitants of Lambeth, was held at the Horns' Tavern, Kennington, to petition his Majesty to dismiss Ministers, and to congratulate the Queen. About 200 persons were present, out of a population of 60,000 souls. The principal speakers were Mr. Williams, M. P. Mr. Thelwall, Mr. Slade, and Mr. Moore. A series of resolutions were proposed, and of course carried unanimously, as was the address to his Majesty, and one to the Queen.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Proprietors of JOHN BULL beg to inform the Public, that in compliance with the wishes of a great name. ber of Correspondents, they intend to publish (after this present week) a Monday Evening Edition of this Paper; which will contain the news of Monday up to four o'clock, at well as the latest price of the Markets, Funds, extracts from Lloyd's List, highly interesting to the Farmer and mtry Merchant.

To commence on Monday, January 15, 1821.

"No Ingrate K. C. B." came to hand too late for insertion.—We have the case in preparation for next Sundby, as our Correspondent will observe.

We had every disposition to be indulgent to the establish mone, the Conductor of which called at our Office last week; having, ence for all, in the outset of this Paper, declined any attentions from such quarters, we are somewhat mortified that he should have thought it necessary to try the sincerity of our resolution; and, at all events, he ought to have known better than to have supposed that we should insert the article he left for the Editor.—No personal interest, nor private interference, will ever have a good effect upon us; and the consequence of his visit will be our total silence upon the subject he is so anxious we zhould speak of for at least six weeks.

We have received another letter; signed " An Englishman," om whom we shall be very glad to hear again.

We lament that our able Correspondent Fitz Harding has both obliged to quit England so suddenly. We would venture to remark that if he does not go farther than Paris, we can hear m kim with as much facility and regularity as if he were at Brighton.

Lady S. B's note has been received.

> JOHN BULL OFFICE, Dec. 30th, 1820.

THE demand for this Paper increases so rapidly, that the Proprietors are compelled to state, that not-withstanding all their exertions, the First Two Numbers, (of which six editions have been actually published) are now enwhich have ordered this Day's Paper with the preceding ones, that they shall positively be furnished with the Two First Numbers to complete their sets in the course of the first quarter of their Subscription.

JOHN BULL.

LONDON, DEC. 31.

Ir is impossible not to see the good effect that a little calm reasoning has had upon the public mind, in relation to the only topic which engrosses it.

No one, who does not wilfully blind himself to it, can fail of seeing the decline of the Queen's popularity. Whence does this arise?—Is she less pureless amiable—or less injured, than she was a few weeks since?-No-but, thank God, common sense and common reason have come to the aid of our countrymen and country-women; they have had time to pause and reflect upon the evidence adduced against herthe admissions made by her own witnesses—the wild defences set up in her behalf-her own general conduct-and above all, upon the character of the support she has met with from public men.

No man can put much faith in the protection given her by such a man as Wood, whose motives have all along been too evident to impose upon any human being:-and no man, even were Wood as pure a patriot as he would have us think him, and believed the Queen as pure a princess as he were a patriot, would think much of a Queen's cause when bolstered up by an Alderman without a Trade, or if with a Trade, a Trade without a name. But even he-Matthew Wood—the wise, omniscient Matthew Wood, allows, that although me has reasons for his conduct towards the Queen, nobody else has-for in all his speeches about her of late, we find this qualification-" If you knew what I know about her,"-" If you could see the things that I have seen,"-" If you were in the secret as I am," you would not wonder at my enthusias :-- the people to the most violent testimonials of admiration for the Queen, he, the leader of the party, admits, that although he knows all sorts of things which would bear him out in his enthusiasm—nobody else does.

Taking Wood, then, as the leader of the Radicals, we may describe the countenance bestowed on the Queen by Joseph Hume, Maj. Gen. Wilson, the Duke of Leinster, &c. as the tribute of Radicalism paid at all times to any object in opposition to Sovereign, and without any particular feeling towards her Majesty which would not equally apply to Henry Hunt or Richard Carlile, for all of whom they have evinced the same tender concern in the way of praises and subscriptions, and in some processions.

The support which she has received from Brougham, Wilde, Denman, and Lushington, she has paid for out of John Bull's pocket, and is therefore fairly entitled to it—these personages, aware of the true value of the respectability which the visits of their ladies would give to her Majesty, kindly threw them into the bargain.—These are "The hirelings;" to these may of course be added, Sir William Gell, Mr. Hownam, Mr. Keppel Caven, and Lady Anne Ha-

Those who have espoused her from mere weakness of intellect, run wild for want of cultivation, are not few.—Sir Gerard Noel—Sir Charles Wolseley-Waddington, and Peter the Wild Boy lead this host. and come under the head of "The drivellers,"

Then the Whigs—and the opposition—the minority in the House of Lords—the ninety-ninc who voted against the Bill of Pains and Penalties—see of these how many have given an implied proof of their feelings toward her. Four the Duke of Bedford the Duke of Leinster-Lord Jersey-and Lord Tanker ville, have either forced or suffered the females of their families to visit her, and no more. These ninety ains then, are her friends, because they are the political opponents of the Administration-mark thislook at it calmly, and the secret will comeout.

Lord Ellenborough voted against the Bill, but hear what he says even in the House

"The Queen of England is one of the last women whom an honourable man would wish to see associate with his wife, or set an example to his daughters."

Lord Calthorpe voted against the Bill, hear what he says in the house:

"The conduct of the Queen has been of the most shameful and disgraceful nature."

Lord Erskine voted against the Bill: hear what he says every where, except in the House.

Lord Grey, whose protestations of her innocence are recorded, speaks of her in private in the most extraordinary terms.

Lord Guilford has been for several years in the habit of calling the Queen Poll, with an epithet prefixed, which we cannot offend our readers by men-Lord Holland has amused his friends by anecdotes of the Queen's conduct before her marriage.

Lord Lansdown in a similar manner relates many anecdotes of Her Majesty since her marriage.

And the Duke of Bedford himself, far as he has gone, is not backward in making the Queen a subject for mirth at his own table.

All this the good sense of the People begins now to find out: the People begin to s Queen is, to her supporters, literally nothing-that they care nothing about her farther than as she answers their own purpose, and she, poor Lady, has begun to find out the same thing. She knows that the Whigs want her in front, to lay open the path to office; and she knows that the very moment they got into place they would renew (if necessary) the strongest measo that; while he and his Satellites have been exciting | sures against her, said turns the very knowledge they have of her failings into accusation against her to be s, for consistency sake, they would not do it by a Bill of Pains and Penalties-but they have laid their plans.

'These things have had their weight; -- respectable people, who were for a time deceived by the specions harangues of the Queen's advocates in parliament, are now undeceived by their subsequent conduct out of parliament. And the simple fact, that to carry their own political point, these very Lords voted for the Divorce of the Queen, has had the effect of stripping: the case of every particle of respectability, and, combined with all the other barefaced trickeries of the faction, has reduced the cry of Caroline for ever into a yell equally debased with any of those which have heretofore distinguished the REPUBLICANS and REVO-LUTIONISTS.

PERSONALITY.

Amongst the great number of Letters we have received, some menacing, but the greater part complimentary, one or two written in a tone of moderation, which demands attention, charge us with indulging toe much in personality.

To any fair remonstrance we shall never hesitate to give a fair answer, and we therefore shall reply to this point.—The accusation can only bear upon the Queen's Visitors, and some other persons who have put themselves forward in a similar way; now this very statement is of itself our full and complete defence.

Those persons and their characters have been dragged before the public, not by us, but by themselves, they have voluntarily advanced their own reputation to support that of the Queen, they are likewise witnesses who of their own accord, choose to give evidence in behalf of an accused person, and yet forseoth they complain that they are made subject to a cross examination.

There are no sessions or assizes can pass in which witnesses who speak to the character of Thieves and Prostitutes, are not tasked by the opposite counsel as to their own morals or honesty, and the whole weight of their evidence depends upon their being able to stand that ordeal. So when some ladies separated themselves from the rest of society, and visited the Queen as evidences in her favour, it cannot be called personality—is it not rather plain justice, to examine the value of that evidence?

If the Times and the Morning Chronicle are to blason the visits of Lady Tankerville and Mrs. Brougham, as proofs of the Queen's strict morality. is JOHN BULL forbidden to shew that there are personal reasons which might make those ladies som what lax on the particular point on which the Queen is accused.

If the Duchess of Bedford had not ostentatiously bestowed her countenance upon the Queen, John Bull would not have thought it necessary to have said that her countenance was not worth a straw. If Mrs. Wilde had not affected to bestow her protection on the Queen of England, nobody would ever have thought of remembering that she had been in the service of Mr. Devaynes

It cannot be doubted that amongst the Lords and Gentlemen who are the political antagonists of John Bull, there are some into whose family transactions, might love to dive, but far from us be such base and unworthy hostility. The political sentiments of public men we shall publicly canvass, but their private feelings and the domestic peace of their families, we shall hold most sacred; nor shall we ever descend to anstomize private character, except when that private character is by its owner dragged into political life; and thrown as it were into the face of the public.

And now we fearlessly ask that public whether those sentiments are not alike just and honourable; convinced that they are so, they shall continue to guide us. We shall not brutally invade the privacy of any man, and still more, if any woman shall have the audacity to give their support and countenance and assistance to immorality and profligacy, no power on earth shall deter us from exposing that profligacy and immorality, and from showing that no one could do so who had not his or her own reasons for such harefaced indelicacy:

It is with regret that we see the Queen's intention of visiting the Mansion House Concert, continues and changed—we regret it, because it will do harm to the Charity, which serves as a pretext for her heartless appearance there—it is true, that there will be a crowd, as vulgar and as noisy a crowd as ever disgusted one on an Easter Monday; and it is also true, that fifteen shillings paid at the door by a Radical (if there be any Radicals who have fifteen shillings to pay) will avail the Charity as much as the sume sum coming from the pocket of a respectable decent man; but it will be a serious blow upon Institutions of this sort, if their reguler and honomable patrons are driven from me porting dientity the introduction of a female into our s, into whose presence they cannot introduce their wives and daughters without appearing to sanction her conduct, and who must at all events sit for two or three hours, having before their eyes a living image which must recal to their imaginations all the disgusting turpitude which was exposed at the bar of the House of Lords.

From the determination of many respectable persons to put a stop to such innovations, by a public and decided avoival of their disapprobation of the Queen's appearance amongst them, we anticipate a good deal of confusion, to which anticipation, doubtless the wise Lord Mayor and the illustrious Wood, will endeavour to attribute the total absence of respectable female company from the Egyptian Hall on Wednesday se'nnight.

Next Sunday, previously to Her Majesty's public display of charity and amiability, we shall take leave to ask her a few serious questions about her balance at her bankers, and her three unaccepted bills of exchange.

DUCHESS OF BEDFORD.

It has been represented to us that her Grace the Duchess of Bedford DID NOT visit the Queen. We can only say that the Queen's Journals asserted the fact, and that it behoved her Grace, if she valued the good opinion of the world, to contradict the report.

By not having done so she has rendered herself liable to all the unpleasant observations and thoughts which the conduct imputed to her has excited.

SIR HENRY BUNBURY.

A new Radical Whig has made his appearance in the person of Sir Henry Bunbury, who has just found out that his Majesty's Ministers are a profligate, spendthrift, incapable, and unsuccessful, and contemptible junto,

When our readers are told that this very person was eight or ten years Under Secretary at War in this very Administration, they will be inclined to doubt whether the poor gentleman can be in his right

But when we add that he is a sinecure placeman, and that he has moreover a pension, during pleasure, they will be convinced that he is stark staring mad.

In our next number we shall give some details upon this subject; and we think we shall be able to shew, that if the Government has deserved any of the abusive epithets which Sir Henry Bunbury bestows upon them, it is by the irregular and excessive favour and indulgence which they have thrown away upon this Sir Henry Bunbury himself.

MR: CHARLES TENNYSON.

The night before the battle of Waterloo if any debased soldier had deserted from one side to the other his information would have rendered him acceptable and the wretch would have derived a momentary importance; and he who, in the ranks of either army, would have been totally insignificant would acquire, from momentary circumstances, some degree of consequence.

So Mr. Charles Tennyson, one of the dumb orators of the House of Commons, a person so obscure that we verily believe few persons knew on which side he was, taking advantage of the present conjuncture, en-deavours to obtain for himself a paltry importance by professing that he has deserted from principle the cause of ministers,

It is not very easy to develope the obscurity of Mr. Charles Tennyson's political life, nor what sentiments actuated it, inasmuch as we cannot find that he has ever delivered those sentiments in the House of Commons; but we learn, on inquiry that so far from being what he is now represented to be-a ministerial man, his vote was adways considered very doubtful; and that, on trying questions, he favoured the opposition with a support which they were not very proud of, nor the ministers very sorry to lose.

We do not blame this-many good and honest men act in the same way, and Mr. Charles Tennyson had a most perfect right to vote as his conscience or his feelings dictated at the moment; but what we do complain of and what we think no good nor honest man would condescend to do, is that, to give more weight to his present attack upon Ministers, it is ostentationsly stated that this is the first time of his differing from them.

Those who have known Mr. Chas. Tennyson as long and as well as we have done, wilk either think his sentiments of no importance at all, or else will be glad, as we are, that he has decidedly gone over to the Queen. But those who are so happy as to have no acquaintance with him might be staggered in their opinion of the proceedings of Ministers if they were suffered to believe that their conduct was so outrageous as to drive inte opposition one of their steady, old, and conscientious supporters:

That Mr. Tennyson was not one of these we take the liberty of repeating; and, divested of this fictitious claim to notice, we fearlessly consign his pamphlet, which would have been a speech, if he could have made one, to the unbiassed judgment of those (if any such there, be, except ourselves) who have had the intrepidity to read it.

FIRE: Wednesday, between eight and nine o'clock in the forenoon, a fire broke out in the kitchen of Thomas Froggat, a chandler's shop, in Foster-mews, Mary-le-bone which in a short time consumed that house, together with all the furniture, &c. and did considerable damage to the adjoining houses; and it was with great difficulty the flames were prevented from catching the back part of some gentlemen's houses in the front street.

THE QUARTER'S REVENUE.—The accounts of the Revenue for the quarter are not yet made up, but we have the satisfaction of stating that its produce for the year 1820, exceeds that of 1819, by about £2,300,000—the excess is in exceeds that of 1819, by about £2,300,000—the excess is in the revenue of Excise, including the produce of the new duty, and the transfer of some duties from the Customs—this transfer has naturally enough created a deficiency in the Customs of about £900,000. The improvements in Trade during the latter part of the last year will materially augment this branch of the Revenue. The exports of the last year we understand exceed by £2,000,000 those of the preceding year. The Post-office is rather deficient (about £80,000.) The assessed taxes have produced £130,000 more than the preceding year. The great increase in the whole of the Revenue is owing to the new duties. The Malt duty alone having exceeded £2,000,000 in increase, and Tobacco being very considerable. and Tobacco being very considerable.

Craddock v. Whitelock.

This case, which should operate as a caution to tradesmen was decided on Friday last. The plaintist, a pastry-cook, summoned the defendant for 11. 5s. 6d. for mince pies, and other pastry, furnished to hisorder, and delivered at his house, on Christmas-day.

It appeared, that Mr. Whitelock, intending to give his

It appeared, that Mr. Whitelock, intending to give his friends an hospitable reception on this annual festival, called on the Saturday preceding, at the plaintiff's shop, and put his talents in requisition for a supply of soup, mince pies, tarts, and ornamental pastry, to be delivered at his residence, at half past five precisely, on the day in question, hot and cold, as required. The order was booked, and punctually pledged; Christmas-day arrived, and the guests punctuarry preugeo; carristmas-nay arrived; and the guests assembled in due course. About five minutes before the appointed time, Mrs. Whitelock, fearful her friends should be kept waiting for their dinners, as is too often the case, until appetite had foresken them, dispatched a servant to refresh the plaintiff's memory, who returned with an assurance, that the materials so very essential to the display of her taste and hospitality, should follow immediately. Her apprehensions thus quieted she suffered a quarter of an hour to clapse, but neither soups nor puffs making their appearance, though impatience was evident in the faces of her stests, she became somewhat more agitated, not to say guests, she became somewhat more agitated, not to say agry. A second message was dispatched. Explanation followed. The delicions morsels had been sent: though, alas—they had never reached their destination. On questioning the boy who took them, it appeared, that just as he was about to ring at the plaintiff's gave, a female whom he supposed to be one of the supernumeries on this extraordinary occasion, came down the steps from the half-door, and seizing the tray and kettle, containing the bot and cold, chid him is no gentle terms for his delay, ordered him to go about his business, and call for his trumpery next day. The boy suspecting no guile, in a form so fair and gentle, beyond the order, and made a precipitate retreat. But no one should trust appearances. It would seem that this fair deceiver, having overheard the answer given to Mrs. White-lock's mossenger, placed herself in ambuscade, and suclock's messenger, placed herself in ambuscade, and succeeded in seizing the savory cargo, and thereby effecting equally the disarrangment of Mrs. Whitelock's temper and the economy of her table, and for a time low-ering the spirits of the assembled guests, by cutting off their supplies. The defendant, under these circumstances, resisted payment, on the ground of the plaintiff's not having fulfilled his contract for delivering, contending that he was not justified in delivering the articles in question to a stranger, without ringing the bell or knocking at the door. The plaintiff on the other hand, contended, that he had delivered the articles according to the order at the defendant's the articles according to the order at the defendant's residence, and was therefore entitled to payment.

The Court, after due deliberation, decided the case in favour of the defendant, to the entire satisfaction of a crowded audience.

Paris and Spanish Papers (the former to the 11st ult. and the latter to the 4th instant.) arrived yesterday. They contain nothing of interest. In the latter it is stated, that on Monday the King received a depotation of the Chamber of Deputies, with the Address of that Assembly, in reply to the Royal Speech on opening the Session; to which the King re-plied as follows:—" I feel deeply sensible of the sentiments plied as follows:—" I feel deeply sensible of the sentiments of the Chamber of Deputies; you have, in expressing them, developed my intentious. It is in fact, assuring me that you will second them; you give me the pledge of the union which ought to exist between me and the Chambers, and which insures the happiness of my people, the only good. I desire, the only one which can really affect my heart."

The Chamber of Peers is still occupied with the further adjourned report on the conspiracy of the 30th June last.

COWARDLY ASSASSINATION IN PARIS .- A young man from Naples came to Paris in order to make some purchases for his approaching marriage, and went one evening to the play. He was there insulted by a person next to him, because he took snuff out of a snuff-box with the charter on it: a third person interposed, and offered himself to be second in combat. The young man who was insulted consented to have no other person present. When they came to the ground in the morning, the aggressor, favoured by the lot, drew first, and missed his adversary. The latter was about to fire in his turn, when the wretch who played the part of second fired a pistol at him, which he had held concealed. Some Gendarmes ran up at the time, and found the victim of an imprudent loyalty almost expiring. The young man survived five hours, and was able to make a declaration sufficiently circumstantial to make us hope that the assassins shall not escape the vigilance of justice. They fled so quickly that the Gendarmes could not perceive them. Some papers state that the young man was robbed at the same time; others state that the assertion is without foundation.

The proposed improvements from Waterlos-placeeastward are in considerable progress. The intended street to the portico of St. Martins's Church, is already marked out, and many of the boildings have been re-moved; it will open one of the most beautiful structures in the metropolis, long entirely concealed from public view. Besides the great acquisition of light and air, this is one of the many proofs of the King's munificence, who has sanctioned and impected the plans; and has also devoted the Crown lands, on which many of the houses stood, and from which some of the Crown revenue was derived, for this purpose.

We feel much pleasure in announcing to our readers, that the Life of our late wise and virrtuous Statesmen, the late William Pitt, is forthcoming from the pen of the Bishop of Winchester. He was the tutor of Mr. Pitt, and his confidential friend through life.

Yesterday being the Epiphany, was kept a holiday at the Stock Exchange and public offices.

On Thursday night, a little before twelve o'clock, a dreadful fire broke out at the house of Mr. Johnson, cheesemonger, East Smithfield. Owing to the severe frost, it was a considerable time before water could be precured. As soon as it was obtained every exertion was firemen, who did not, however, succeed in arresting the progress of the flames, till three houses, viz. those of Mr. Emerson, chemist; Mr. Duff, a dyer; and Mr. Johnson's. were destroyed, and considerable damage done to four or five houses backwards.

SKAITING.—Thursday, at one o'clock, the Match for One Hundred Guineas, to skaita mile in three minutes, was decided. The person selected to perform the match appears to have been a countryman in the neighbourhood of the fems. He started a few seconds before the time, and came up in speed to the scratch at the m. ment appointed, and per-formed the distance seven seconds under the three minutes. The spot selected for the performance was on the fens, near to Isleham. four miles from Elv and eleven from Newmarket. Considerable bets were depending on the match, and the result has surprised most persons. Indeed the speed is extra-ordinary, as compared with the first race-horses recorded in annals.

ATROCIOUS MURDER AND HIGHWAY ROBBERY .- A few evenings ago a most shocking murder and robbery was committed on Timothy Niven, by a gang of ruffians in Rosemary-lane. On Tuesday morning, about cleven o'clock, he left his house for the purpose, as was understood, of receiving a sum of money from his Club, in Rose-mary-lane; nor was any thing heard of him till between nine and ten o'clock at night, when the people of the house were alarmed by moaning on the stairs; and the decreased exclaiming " () God, will no one help me!" The decreased informed his landlord that he had been knocked down, robbed, and test for dead, at a short distance from the Anchor and Hope public house, by a gang of men, one of whom threatened to blow his brains out. He died the following morning. After a momentary consultation the Jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder against some person or persons at present unknown."—The deceased was a single man, and thirty-six

TO JOHN BULL.

SIR-In these times, when the Queen's case absorbs all our thoughts, outrages the most foul lose their hold on public attention, and often escape the odium they deserve. Thus alone can we account for the almost total silence with which has been passed over Thus alone can we account for the one of the most shocking attacks that was ever made on an individual.

The fate of Mr. Wakeley, of Argyle-street, some months ago, must be well recollected by most of your readers. His attempted murder, the burning of his house; and above all, the reports artfully and extensively spread against him, formed an accumulation of evils that render his fate one of the most aggravated

It may be known, too, by many of your readers, that a pamphlet, containing the depositions of all his neighbours, was published, to counteract the mischief of the falsehoods so cruelly circulated. This pamphlet I read; and the extraordinary suspicion to which I was led, and that to which all who carefully read it must be led, was, that the crime was committed by no other thau the adherents of the traitors, who suffered for the Cato-street plot. This suspicion too, is strongly corroborated by the anonymous threats before, and the promises of further vengeance, which I understood he has received since the outrage alluded to:

Were the act only of a private nature, the veil which now renders it mysterious, might still remain undrawn; but we may well suspect that it is not so: there is strong reason to consider it as a proof that the remnant of those miscreants are still near us, and still active; a supposition so alarming as to call for the strictest

At all events, the public should know more. It is incumbent on Mr. Wakeley, or such of his friends as are acquainted with the facts, to publish whatever has not transpired publicly: and I should rejoice if the insertion of these remarks in your journal proved the means of cliciting the truth in an affair at present so mysterious.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant, Friday Morning, Dec. 29.

We agree with our correspondent in his surprise at the very little noise this extraordinary event has made; and as he appears to be interested in the affair, we have much pleasure in inserting his letter.

TO JOHN BULL.

Sir-From the terms in which you spoke of the Com-Sir—From the terms in which you spoke of the CommonCouncil of the city of London in your last paper, and the way in which you held up to ridicule the honourable and respectable names of Guy, Figgins, Humpleby, Bumstend, Clack, Smallpiece, Pigeon, and Peppercorn, I am apprehensive you will hardly think it worth while to give place to the few observations I have to make upon Mr. Alderman Waithman's conduct conduct.

Insignificant as this person is in his political character, and humble as his place may be amongst mer-cantile men, (if a retail linen-draper be allowed to rank as one) he has contrived, by dint of persevering assurance, and a total disregard for the many little delicacies of society, to make a noise in our city; and. as you doubtless know, presides over our ward, as Alderman.

How he became our Alderman it may not be un-amusing to know. His bosom friend, Mr. Williams, now one of our Sheriffs, was, on the death of Sir now one of our Sherills, was, on the death of Sir Charles Price, seized with a prodigious desire for the vacant gown; and as Mr. Waithman then represented us in Parliament, Williams waited upon him, and claimed, by all the ties of former friendship, his support, to obtain the wished-for distinction. The ambitious heart of Waithman panted for it too; and, the western washed places it he imspeaking candidly, (as the world phrazes it) he imparted his wish to his friend, shrewdly observing, that a seat in Parliament was very precarious: but that an Alderman's gown no disgust at his politics could ever deprive him of.

Williams was started at the inordinate rapacity of the Member, and seemed rather hurt. Upon which our Alderman told him he did not wish to have any discussion, but that if he did not let him have the gown quietly, he would stand a poll with him for it; by which means, added Mr. Waithman, our strength will be divided, and Blades will be elected; and though I do not get it, I shall have the pleasure of ousting you. Warm with the good of the cause, Sheriff Williams concented to knock under; and the linen-draper was accordingly returned.

Hitherto, there has been a show of impartiality about Waithman—a pretence at smow of impartiality cency in his office; and till the Queen called upon him (which friendly additionally (which friendly visit, by the way family have returned), he seemed to affect a show of political honesty. This, however, at the election of Common Councilmen, last month, he suddenly threw off; and his behaviour was, as the President of such a meeting, shamefully prejudiced. Every mau who disagreed with him was out of order: while gin-sellers and sausage-makers were allowed to put off theurs. spective commodities in set specches of hours long, which did not in the least bear upon the subject matter in debate.

That day has lost him more popularity than years will regain. We had thought him honest, and deluded into violence by men with longer heads and blacker hearts than his own; but we now see that the spirit of mischief is in him—that an obstinate resolu-tion to go wrong has laid hold of him, and that in the blindness of his zeal for principles which lost him a seat in Parliament, he will fall back into the mire, whence, by combinations almost miraculous, he has been exalted.

Should this appear next Sunday, the ward of Far-ringdon Without will be obliged to you: and if you think he deserves it, I will supply you with many droll anecdotes of his political life;—an account of the action brought against him by his shopman, with the pleasant Episode of the Roasted Goose, and many other comical adventures,—I am Sir, yours, Thursday, Jan. 4. A LIVERYMAN OF LONDON.

Mr. Waithman is almost beneath our anger; but, as the adventures alluded to seem to promise a laugh, we shall be glad to hear from our correspondent. must authenticate as he goes along, and our readers shall have the Goose reasted next Sunday.

THEATRICALS.

BRANDENBURG HOUSE.

Every body recollects these amusements in the Margravine's time, and with a Theatre ready to her hand, and her known fondness for all kinds of theatrical amusements, it was naturally to be expected that her Majesty should renew those entertainments.

We were, therefore, not surprized to learn that her Majesty has celebrated her acquittal by the performance of The Agreeable Surprize! Her Majesty herself condescending to play the Widow Cheshire, a character vastly better suited to her Majesty's taste than either the Muse of History, or the Automaton, which she exhibited with such success abroad.

Lady Anne Hamilton we learn, was deliciously naive and innocent in Cowslip; her manner of communicating to Doctor Lingo, (Parr) that "the high lady in the little parlour was the great Russian Prin-cess Rusty-Fusty," produced roars of applause. No other English Lady keeping company with her Majesty, the part of Fringe was necessarily committed to the Countess Oldi? and notwithstanding some difficulties of pronunciation, she got through it wonderfully.

In the passage in which it is said "That the dear Lady had nothing to defend her honour but her fan and seissors, and that she called for her own maid, a faithful, sensible body, who never blabbet, packed up her portmanteau, crossed the seas, and landed at Blackheath," thunders of applause and indignation testified the sense of the audience, as to the wretches who had betrayed the virtuous Rusty-Fusty.

The line "The lawyer has betrayed you great Potentate," was very effective; but in the scene where the cake is presented to her, the roars of applause were tremendous, particularly at that part where Lingo says—"Some cake for your faithful Mainety.

Majesty,
Mrs, C.—" My Majesty! Oh, this is mere diver-

We have been favoured with a copy of one or two of the songs, which had been a little altered and adapted to the occasion. That by Mrs. Cheshire, "The Lad that can bustle and Stir," we are sorry that we dare not give, as we do not wish to offend the ears of our readers.

Doctor Parr's song of— " Amo smas, "lam an ass

Is rather too rambling and pedantic for insertion as full length; we shall, therefore, content ourselves with giving, as a specimen, the adaptation of-"In Johnny Bull when bound for France," from which it may be concluded that Mr. Brougham' favour is not so high at Brandenburgh House as people suppose; nor, indeed, can we quite account for a sneer at Alderman Wood, otherwise than on a supposition that the foreign influence of Court Vassali has been of late very prevalent.

In Harry Brougham, when bound to France, A shuffler we discover; He boped to send the Queen a dance, And stay himself in clover, He humbugged Liverpool-Oh la; Made Hutchinson a fool-Ha! Ha! But failed the Queen to rule-Huzza; So Harry returned to Dover. For Matthew Wood, although an ass,

Out-generalied the new-comer, And proved, a blockhead may surpass A Jesuit at St. Omer.

He talked of Crown and State—so fair; Palace, and purse, and plate—in air; And stiffed Harry's prate—Oh rare? And made the Dumb Lord dumber.

The Alderman such nighness, He found her case not quite so good, And felt a sudden shyness. In accents smooth as milk--good lack; He asked for a gown of silk—so black; Offered the Lady to bilk—kept back, And helped to humble her Highness.

But, having found his offer scorn'd, And impotent to clog hers, His ready steps about he turued, Humbly content to dog hers. Then with grimace, and cries-Oh la: Bluster, shuffie, and lies-Ha! Ha! Insults our ears and eyes—and bar; The Prince of PETTYFOGGERS!

Sin-Allow me, through the medium of your paper, to inquire of Dr. Borland, whether it be true, that the Queen drank a bottle of Madeira at breakfast, and another at dinner, at his house, in Genoa? and and whether, in consequence of her subsequent in-toxication, she talked so strangely, that Mrs. Borland was obliged to quit the room?

I do not call upon any witness who must be sent for to the Continent, to satisfy us. Doctor Borland is living at Kensington, and will doubtless favour you with a reply, if he can answer these questions in the negative.—I am, Sir, yours,

JUSTICE.

MISCELLANEOUS.

We are happy to be able to call the attention of our readers to a new periodical poblication, called the Cottager's Monthly I isitor," which is advertized in this day's paper. As a present from the mistress of a family to her oppressed servants, or from the rich landlord to his poor tenants, it appears to us it might be of. great use in these days of blasphemy and disaffection. From the Morning Post.

SIR—I am requested to obtain your opinion upon a question of considerable moment to the Heroes of Waterloo, as well as involving a nice point of chivalrous honour.

College of Arms, BrandenburghHouse, Jan. 4th, 1821.

The Major-General herein alluded to is no Knight—and moreover is not even a Companion of the Bath! We extract the following from a Paper of Wednesday se'nnight.

The Rev. Sir Harcourt Lees, Bart .- We have heard with much pleasure, that the Rev. Sir Harcourt Lees, Bart. has been solicited by several of the most distinguished characters in the empire, to publish the whole of his popular works in two volumes, distinguishing the religious from the political subjects. The interest created by this Gentleman's pointers subjects. The interest created by this Gentleman's numerous Writings throughout Great Britain, as well as Ireland, has been, we believe, unprecedented. Sound inhis principles as a supporter of the Established Church, a vindicator of the dignity of the Crown, and bold in the avowal of those principles, he has astenished and confounded the adversaries of both. Proceeding as Sir Harcourt steadily is in this truly useful and honourable experscourt steadily is in this truly useful and honourable career, we anticipate the happiest effects from his great literary talents, at a time when the Press—that powerful instrument of good or cyli—is brought into such alarming opera-tion against religion and loyalty, in an empire which we once fondly hoped had been destined by the providence of God for the propagation of civilization and Christianity throughout the globe."

The Address to his Majesty from Edinburgh is signed by upwards of sixteen thousand citizens, the highest proportion of the population of that city than ever before affixed their signatures on any former occasion.

The county of Worcester Loyal Address to his Majesty, received immediately the signatures of the High Sheriff, the Earl of Coventry, the Bishop of Worcester, Lord Viscount Deerhurst, the Hon. Henry Beauchamp Lygon, the Hon. Edw. Pyndar Lygon, and many other distinguished persons.

*Receiver-Generalizing of the Customs in Ireland.—Col. Clampate (who is to do the division of the desire).

Clements (who is to do the duties of the office in person), is appointed to it on the retirement or superannuation of Sir George Shee, Bart, with the reduced salary of 1,000l. a year. Heretofore this situation has been a sinecure, (with a salary of 2,000l.) but by a new arrangement, this is no longer to be the case.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will remove his residence from the Vice-regal Lodge, in the Phoenix Park, to the Castle, on Monday, the 12th of February; and the first Levce will be on Tuesday the 13th of February; and the first Drawing-room, on Thursday evening the 22d of February.

The following is the Marquis of Anglesey's reply to the promoters of a Meeting of Staffordshire, "to consider the best means of securing our glorious Constitution, equally against the dangerous designs of the seditious and disaffected on the one hand, and the engrous hand, and the engrous hand, and and the encroachments and abuses of Ministerial power on the other."

Uxbridge House, Dec. 26, 1820.
GENTLEMEN—Being of opinion that you will not stop sedition and disaffection, by informing the seditions and disaffected that they have grounds for being so—being moreover convinced that such grounds do not exist; that the public are grossly deluded by the most infamous false-hoods and misrepresentations; and that there does not exist any party in the State so able, or so willing, as those who are now entrusted with the reins of Government, to reserve to each of the three estates of our Constitution its fair balance of power—to the People their just rights, and to the Press its lawful liberty, which nothing but its own licentiousness can endanger—I decline signing a requisition for a meeting of the county of Stafford, which will throw an unjust imputation upon the character of those who now exercise Ministerial power. (Signed) " ANGLESEY."

Drakelow, the seat of Sir Roger Gresley, Bart. has lately been the scene of great festivity and rejoicing. The young Baronet came of age on the 27th of last month, on which occasion all the tenantry and poor were regaled with an abundance of old English fare roast beef and plum pudding, and well garnished with Sir John Barleycorn, &c.

The Earl of Bridgewater has, in the course of the present holidays, clothed and fed three hundred of the industrious poor round his superb residence of Sir Samuel Auchmuty has been a liberal contributor to the poor during the holidays, by supplying them with coals and money, and selecting poor families near his seat of Syndal Mouse, in Kent, who have the largest number of children, and completely clothing them from head to feet.

The new Haymarket Theatre is to be finished by the 15th of April, and opened on the 15th of May.

Government (says one of the Queen's Journals) has paid 600k being the half-year's rent due by the Queen for Brandenburgh House, and that Lady Ann Hamilton has been compensated from the same quarter, for the use of her Ladyship's house in Portman-street, by her Majesty, in the course of the last summer.

In the North of Scotland there has been so heavy a fall of snow, that in the glens or vallies between the hills it is at least ten feet in depth, and many sheep have been buried in it.

The frost has set in at Paris with as great severity as in London. The French Papers state that the cold was intense. The thermometer was on the 28th last, four degrees below zero.

An old veteran soldier, named John Barry, is now living at Rathcormack, in the county of Cork, who is in the 108th year of his age. He distinguished him-self in several severe actions in the reigns of George II. and in the early part of his late Majesty, in one of which he received a desperate wound which rendered him incapable of further service, and he was invalided with a pension of 20 guineas per annum.

Captain Lyon, R. N., who lately returned from the so indispensable is a newspaper become in all situations, and to all ranks of the people of England, either afloat or ashore, above ground or in mines below ground, that even the crews of the Polar vessels could not dispense with this necessary of life, when immured in utter gloom for 83 days, and with the glass at 50 under zero. A newspaper was actually composed, printed and distributed for the information of the people. Captain Sabine was the Editor, while Capt. Parry wrote and prepared Dramas, which were regularly performed for their amusement.

A remarkable circumstance lately occurred at Paris: The time for which 400 of the Royal Regiment of Swiss Gaards had enlisted having expired, the General commanding them used all his innuence to induce them to re-enlist, but not a single one would consent.

On Wednesday John Palin, the man who was taken into custody some time ago, upon a charge of high treason, and conspiring with Arthur Thistlewood and others, to assassinate his Majesty's Ministers, was brought from Coldbath-fields prison, before the Privy Council, at Whitchall, and was examined for upwards of an hour and a half. He declared, that it never was his intention to join in the horrid deed, and that he had all along endeavoured to persuade Thistlewood and his companions from the act which they meditated. Patin was called upon to enter into his own recognizances in the sum of 500l. for seven years, and to be under the surveillance of the Police. He entered into the recognizances, and was discharged.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS.

On Thursday, Henry Eld, a young man of decent appearance was indicted on a charge of being concerned in a rio-tous mob on the 31st of August last, and with violently assaulting an officer in the execution of his duty. James Whaley said he was constable belonging to Bow-street, and that on the 31st of August he was in St. Jaines's-

A mob, consisting of 200 or 300 persons, cried out in a vio-lent manner, "Rescue him from the blood-hounds," and began to throw brick-bats and stones at the constables. Mr. Mills, in the mean time, was put into a coach, and, as they were conveying him along the Strand, the mob still followed and continued assaulting the constables. As they were coming by the Hungerford Coffee-house a stone or a brick-bat passed close to his head; he immediately turned round, and saw that the prisoner, who appeared at the head of the mob, was the man who threw the stone. He immediately jumped down from the coach, and laid hold of the prisoner, who tried to get away from him. With the assistance, how ever, of the other constables he secured the prisoner, and took him a way in spite of the mob.

Wm. Wotton, another patrole belonging to Bow-street, said he was following the coach, and saw the prisoner at the head of the mob hallooing; they were throwing brickbats, and calling out to rescue Mr. Mills. Witness had his head cut with a brick-bat; saw the prisoner the moment he was taken into custody.

Mr. Const said the only question the Jury had to try was, whether they believed the witness for the prosecution as to the prisoner taking an active part with the mob, and being the person who threw the stone,

The Jury, without retiring, found the defendant Noc Guilly

H. Price, a young man of a very mean and shabby appearance, was indicted for publishing a false and malicious libel, tending to excite public contempt and hatred against his Royal Highness the Duke of York. The libel was one of those printed placards, purporting to be published by Benbow, in the Strand; and consisted of several interrogatories requiring to know the gatories requiring to know the reason why the populace applauded his Royal Highness, and asking whether it was for his skill as a General—his conduct at the Helder—his getting Parson O'Meara to preach before the King—his intercourse with Mrs. Clarke—his taking 10,000l, for visitable and food of the his conduction of the his conduction his c ing his aged father—his receiving 30,000l. a-year from the public, as well as vast sums from the Droits of Admiralty—his hostility to the Queen, &c. &c.

It was clearly proved that he was distributing these libels out of a large bag in St. James-square, among the populace assembled to viewthe Que in.

In his defence he reiterated the libel, and the Jury, without hesitation, found him Guilty.

On Friday, H. Price, for a tibel on the Duke of York was brought to receive sentence.

Mr. Reynolds, as Counsel for the Crown, said, that as conceived the ends of justice had been sufficiently satisfied by the conviction of the former day, he should not call any witnesses against the defendant in this indictment. The defendant was therefore acquitted.

The Chairman then, after pointing out to the defendant the atrocity of that offence by his attempt to justify it, sentenced him to one year's imprisonment in Newgate; and directed that he should enter into his own recognizance in the sum of 50l, to keep the peace for three years.

Thomas Clark was convicted of an assault upon William Radford, a private in the Life Guards, while upon duty on the 15th of June last, the King's Levee Day. The prisoner was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment.

Mr. Alley then, addressing the Court, said, that he had to say a few words upon the subject of an arrest which had been made of the person of an old friend of his, Mr. William Soames, (A laugh.) This gentleman (a laugh) had been taken up, tried, and convicted as a reputed rogue and vagabond: and he was now to be brought up on that summary proceeding for sentence. He was well dressed, and a robust looking man.

The Chairman observed, that in the indictment against Soames no premises were laid; it was neither stated that any act of vagabonding or roguery had been committed by Soames in that neighbourhood, nor that he was apprehended under any suspicious circumstances.

Oldy, the officer, was then called. He had not seen any improper act committed by Soames.

Mr. Soames was then discharged, after this friendly ex horization from Mr. Alley-" Now do take care of yourself for the future."

Mr. Soames acknowledged his obligations for the kind interest manifested by the learned counsel, by a graceful bow, and then retired.

POLICE.

Bow-street.-The last Act of Parliament, for the regulation of Hackney Coaches, provides for the protection of the property of persons travelling by them, which might be left in them by accident. The crime of felony is incurred by any Hackney-coachman who keeps property in his possession four days. The Act compels him to deposit it at the Olice of the Commissioners of Hackney-coaches. On Monday a case of this description was brought before R. Birnie, Esq. the Sitting Magistrate, on a charge preferred against James Shern, the driver of the hackney-coach, No. 544, for unlawfully detaining a valuable gun, worth 29 guineas, the property of Mr! Thompson, the Commissioner of the Navy. The gun was proved to have been pledged at Mr. Baker's, the Pawnbroker, in Aldgate, for 101. Mr. Thompson hay seep the gun at Mr. Baker's shop, and identified it to be his property.—The prisoner was committed for further examination. for further examination.
FORGED BANK NOTES.—Another investigation took place on Wednesday before Sir Robert Baker, respecting the case of William Sims uttering a forged Bank-note of 11, to Mr. of William Sims uttering a forged Bank-note of II. to Mr. Watson, a pastry-cook, in Long Acre, on Tuesday evening, the 26th of December, when Mr. Noel, the attorney, of Gray's Inn, with whom the prisoner had some time since lived, as a servant, happened to be passing the shop window at the time, observed the prisoner in the transaction, and having no doubt but that he was uttering a forged note; and after he had uttered it for the purchase of a three-shilling Twelfth Cake, he rushed into the shop and snatched up the note, the prisoner having given his name as Smith up the note, the prisoner having given his name as Smith, residing in Henrietta-street, Covent-garden. The reason that Mr. N. suspected he was uttering a forged note was, that since the prisoner had left his service he had discovered that he had uttered a number of forged notes in his name, probably as many as twenty, some of them to persons he was well known to, his tradesmen, &c. A constable was sent for, and the prisoner was brought from Mr. Watson's shop to the office. The prisoner confessed that he had re-ceived the forged notes he had uttered from a man of the name of Thomas Williams, who lodged at a Coffee-shop in Drury-lane; Lavender and Bishop, the officers, in consequence, went and apprehended him, and found four one pound notes in his possession. The two prisoners were brought to the office, and Mr. Maynard attended as Solicitor to the Bank, and a Bank Inspector, as did Mr. Noel was fully committed to Newgate for trial.

Daring Street Robbery.—On Thursday, General Sir John Lambert was attacked by one of the gangs who infest the Strand, between one and two o'clock, near the Crown and Anchor Tavern. Two of the gang were seen to mark out Sir John as an object for robbery, by Cartain Crock. out Sir John, as an object for robbery, by Captain Crosby, who happened to be passing at the time, and saw one of them pointing apparently at his pocket, as if they knew it contained a pocket-book. Shortly after the cry of "Stop thief," was raised, and as Sir John expressed himself at the investigation before Mr. Birnie, the Magistrate, he had other avocations to attend to, and was passing on, not considering that he had any thing to do with the cry of " Stop thief;" but it being repeated, he looked round out of curiosity, and saw a red morocco pocket-book: he at the same instant felt his pocket, when he missed his pocket-book, and then recognised the red morocco pocket-book in the hand of a labouring man'

Mr. William Tucker, of Arundel-street, in the Strand, was crossing from Picket-street, nearly opposite to the Crown and Anchor Tavern, when he saw two men attacking Sir John Lambert, by hustling him, and saw one of them take Sir John's pocket-book out of his pocket, and give it to his companion, whose name proved to be Carroll, and to his companion, whose name proved to be Carroll, and who put it into his own pocket. The act being so very glaring, Mr. Tucker seized hold of Carroll by the collar, who gave him a violent blow, which loosened some of his teeth. Carroll in consequence escaped, and ran off down Milford-iane; Mr. Tucker recovered himself, pursued Carroll, calling "Stop thief!" who was at length taken in France stant Owen Swanay a Jahunging man gaw Carroll. roll, calling "Stop thief!" who was at length taken in Essex-street. Owen Swaney, a labouring man, saw Carroll whilst running, drep the pucket-book; when he picked it up, and on its being claimed by Sir John, he delivered it to him. It contained a 5l. Bank of England note and some papers. A constable was procured, and Carroll was brought to the Office, and on the above circumstances being proved to the option of Mr. Ringia Carroll was fully comto the Office, and on the above circumstances being proved to the satisfaction of Mr. Birnie, Carroll was fully committed to take his trial at the ensuing Sessions.

Sir John Lambert spoke very highly of the conduct of Owen Swaney in the recovery of his property, and promised to reward him for his loss of, time.

Friday being the day appointed for the second examination of William Lill, charged with obtaining a number of Barristers' wire gauge for my defalse preferences attention.

Barristers' wigs, gowns, &c. under false pretences, attracted the presence of several Gentlemen of the Bar.

Mr. Truesit, a wig-maker of Hanover-street, Long-acre, stated that on Friday, the 29th of December last, the prisoner came to his shop, and by a comparison of the time he left Alice's Coffee-house, he must have proceeded there direct, when he offered him for sale a barrister's wig, gown, and bands, which he said had been the property of Mr. Ellison, who had left the profession of the law. He informed the prison be went to be said to be a formed the prisoner he was not in want of such articles, but at length agreed to give him five shillings for them, and if he could make more of them to any body else before he disposed of them, he would let him him fixe them again if he gave him a givence for his teach the save he gave him a sixpence for his trouble.

Upon the above evidence the prisoner was committed for Marlborough-Street.—On Wednesday, George Smith was charged with stealing from the shop of Mr. Metcalfe, draper in Oxford-street, twenty yards of kerseymere, on Tuesday evening.—He was fully committed for trial.

EXTENSIVE SHOP-LIPTING.—James Perry was charged before G. Farrant, Esq. as an accessary in diverge forms with Mary James already committed for shop lifting. The with Mary Jones, already committed for shop-lifting. The prisoner's lodgings were searched, and three hundred yards of stuffs, &c. were found, together with one hundred and thirty duplicates of linen-drapery goods. Besides these, there were found nineteen boards upon which goods were wrapped, in the prisoner's possession. The prisoner was remanded, to give linen-drapers an opportunity of identifying him, together with the female Jones. fying him, together with the female Jone

Worship-street.—On Wednesday, Joshua Armstrong, Vann, and Mantz, officers of Worship-street, in consequence of information they received, went on Friday se'nnight to execute a search warrant at the house of a man William Hearne, in Providence-place, Bell-yard, Golden-William Hearne, in Providence-place, Bell-yard, Golden-lane. On their arrival they found the lower part of the house barricadocd, and Armstrong proposed getting in at the first floor window. The other officers lifted him up on their shoulders, and he no sooner entered than Hearne, who was in bed, jumped up, and ran to a place where there was a crack in the partition, from which he took a brown paper a crack in the partition of the stairs; it contained fifty along parcel and flung it down the stairs; it contained fifty-nine one-pound forged notes. There was no proof that the Prisoner forged them, but he was fully committed for having them in his possession only.

MURDER.

Tuesday evening, a coroner's inquest was held at the Buffaloe's Head Tavern, New Road, Marylebonne, before Thomas Stirling, esq. on the body of John Whiting, a brick-layer, who was killed by his labourer throwing a large stone at him on the morning of last Tuesday fortnight.

Thomas Dyer sworn—I am apprentice to Mr. Clements, carpenter, of Northumberland-street, New Road. I was at work on the morning of Friday fortnight at some buildings in St. John's Wood, where the deceased and his labourer, Richard Foy, were also at work. They were in the employ of Mr. Austin, the builder, in Northumberland-street, who, being out of town, gave the deceased orders to see that the labourers attended to their work. Richard Foy did not attend to his business as he outer, and he de-Foy did not attend to his business as he ought, and the deceased reprimanded him for his conduct, and threatened to tell his master; Foy replied very insolently, and a great many unpleasant words passed between them. They after-wards fought several rounds, in which Foy was vanquished wards fought several rounds, in which Foy was vanquished and returned to work. At twelve o'clock, the deceased, Foy, and another bricklayer, named Dowder, his laboarer, and myself, left the building to go to dinner. Foy and myself walked together, and the deceased walked before us; and when we arrived near the Yorkshire Stingo-gate, in the New Road, Foy picked up a large stone out of the horse road, and put it into a bag. In a few minutes afterwards, Foy took the stone out of his bag and ran up to the deceased; threw it at him with all the violence and force that he was capable of, and it struck the deceased on the that he was capable of, and it struck the deceased on the back of his head. The deceased, the moment he received the wound, sprung up into the air nearly a yard high, then turned round several times, and fell on the ground apparently lifeless. He was conveyed to Mr. Norton, the surgeon, in Gloucester-place. The blood issued from both ears and the nose, and from the wound spirted across the cars and Mr. Norton examined the wound spirted across the road. Mr. Norton examined the wound, and recommended him to be taken home, and to have the wound washed with warm water and vinegar.

Mr. Goodyear, surgeon at the Marylebone Infir stated, that he attended the deceased. He found the skull fractured externally and internally. (The stone which in-flieted the wound was now produced. From its size, it must have been thrown with great violence, or it could not have effected so desperate a wound). The brain was injured; and the blow given by Foy was the cause of the death of the deceased.

Several other witnesses were examined. Their depositions only tended to corroborate the former evidence, to show that the deceased was a most respectable man and valuable servant, and that Foy was instigated by a spirit of revenge when he committed the diabolical act.

The Jury returned an unanimous verdict of " Wilful murder against Richard Foy." who has absconded.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

BRIGHTON, January 4th.—A night more inclement and severe than the last it would be difficult to in agine the northern blast lost nothing of its violence and cutting edge until towards day-break, and till which time nearly, snow continued to descend. The night coaches which started hence for London at ten o'clock, shad made but a mile or two's progress on the road when they were compelled to turn back, the collected snow having rendered it impassable. Several carriages with four horses, noticed last night, which left this place, filled with townsfolk, to be present at a Ball at Newhaven, got land-locked likewise. Last night the valleys were raised almost to a level with the mountainty tain's summit; one of the carriages above spoken of, sunk in, and had nearly disappeared, horses, drivers, and all within the vehicle, before the full extent of the danger was discovered. After much labour and more alarm, all got back unhurt to their several homes. The early coaches for London this morning—those which start at six, seven, and eight o'clock all turned back, after ineffectual attempts to conquer the first stage. The mail cart, which should have arrived at four, did not come in till nine o'clock this morning; and one of the night coaches from London made its appearance soon afterwards.

Carisbrooke.—A dreadful accident occurred on Tucaday last. Two young gentlemen, sons of a Captain in the army, were amusing themselves by firing at a trap-door in a barn, when one of the balls entered through the door, and coming in contact with a piece of quarter, it rebounded and entered the head of a man named Simmonds who was in the barn. The poor man is since dead.

CHESTERFIELD.—The body of Mr. John Hinde, a mailster and farmer at Whittington, was found in a lifeless state on the common, at an early hour on Friday. The Nottingham Fly waggon had passed over the body, nor would the waggoner have discovered it, owing to the darkness of the morning, but for the barking of the deceased's dog. The wag-goner says, he met a suspicious character with a large goner says, ne met a suspicious characters, and there club stick, at some distance in the Common, and there is a large wound in the front of Mr. H.'s head. The matter is undergoing an investigation. Mr. H. was much respected: he has left a wife and four children.

CREWKERNE.—The auxiliary mail coach from London to Exeter, via Shaftesbury, Yeovil, and this Town, was on Wednesday discovered to be on fire about a mile from hence. To such a height had it got before it was observed, that the hore. So were taken and the such as it was observed, that the bags, &c. were taken out and forwarded to Exeter by chaises, and the vehicle required many kours' labour before it was considered that for travelling.

Dowen.—We have, during the late tempestuous weather, had several ships put in for shelter, amongst them a fine American vessel (the Restitution,) from Batavia, bound to Rotterdam; two Dutch vessels; a Swedish ketch, bound to Barcelona, from Gotten-burgh; and a fleet of colliers. It is much to be regretted that the good qualities of this harbour are not better known. There is not a better dry harbour on all the coast than Dover. At spring tides we have 18 to 20 feet in: there is an excellent inner harhour, capable of containing 70 sail, which could always be kept aftoat, and before next winter a double row of large iron tunnels, laid under the west pier, will be completed, to prevent any bar washing up at the entrance of the harbour. Independently of this, the harbour never was better than it has been this winter.

Doupries.—In that seelpded region which stretches between the Glenkens and Newton-Stewart, they have adopted a mode of communication, which, in point of simplicity, is worthy of the days of Lot and Abram. In this part of the country the farms are very large, and at the extremity, or as near, as may be to the extremity of each farm, there is generally a rock which the heads denominate their next effects. rock, which the herds denominate their post-office. The person who resides in the least remote farm, sends to the neighbouring village or burgh-town for the newspaper, which he has no sooner perused, than he commits it to the care of a sturdy herd, who forthwith deposits it in some chink of the rock already men-bissed; from this place it is picked up by the servant of the adjoining tenant, who, in his turn, forwards it to some second station; and in this way, we are told, the Dumfries and Galloway Courier will pass through eight or ten different hands, and over twice the number of miles, in the course of a day or two, carrying the news and novelties of London to the inmost recesses of Loch Doon or Loch Dungcon.

KILHARNOCK - Robert Neilson, one of the post midera from Glasgow to this town, was convicted, at the instance of the Post-Master-General, before a Justice of Peace Court, held here last week, of having, on a late occasion, lost time in conveying the mail from Glasgow, of being intoxicated while on duty, and of violently resisting the orders of the Postmaster. The salutary punishment of four weeks confinement lo hard labour was in this case awarded

"LIMERICK .- A most atrocious attempt was made to assassinate A. Hoskins, Esq. Agent for Lord Courtnev sestates, as he was walking in his pleasure grounds. A fellow concealed in the shrubbery, presented a blunderbuss at Mr. H. which missed fire, he then deliberately shook the powder in the pan, and presented it a second time with the like result. Upon which he drew from his bosom a large pistol, the ball from which fortunately only grazed Mr. H.'s shoulder. The villain finding his shot had not the desired effect,

House of Correction attempted lately to make their escape, but by the vigilance of the watchman they were prevented. It seems one of the prisoners had converted a pocket knife into a saw, with which he had sawed the irons off his legs, and with a broken piece of one had forced open the door of a cell, in which four prisoners were confined; by the assistance of these men three other prisoners were liberated, when the noise they made alarmed the watchman, and they were secured. NEWCASTLE.—C

-Christmas morning, as the Rev. T. Hogan, Parish Priest of this town, was vesting him-self in order to celebrate first Mass, and the chapel crowded to excess, the galleries suddenly gave way, and fell. Nothing was to be heard but the cries of those in danger, and the lamentations of others outside, for the safety of their children and friends; but providentially, not a single individual was seriously ijured.

Northampton.—A dreadful occurrence took place NORTHAMPTON.—A greadful occurrence took place in this town a few evenings since at the Plumber's Arms, kept by a German. A party of the 80th regiment in barracks here got into a dispute with some of the inhabitants respecting the Queen, when, after exchanging blows, the soldiers drew their side-arms, and wounded several persons severely, five were conveyed to the Informatic conveyed and one of the to the Infirmary severely wounded, one of the name of Robinson is since dead. Four of the soldiers are in custody.

Portshours.—Thirty-two tubs of foreign spirits were picked up by his Majesty's sloop Hind, a few days ago, off St. Alban's Head, and two smuggling boats were chased, and compelled to throw over the whole of their cargoes, by the same ship.—A large boat, with 185 tubs of brandy and geneva, was fallen in with on Thursday, off the Isle of Wight, by the Quail, tender to the Albion, and brought to the Custom House in this town.

PLYMOUTH .--Curious Occurrence-A tradesman of this town, having lately placed some oysters in a cupboard, was surprized at finding, in the morning, a mouse caught by the tail, by the sudden, collapsing of the shell. This incident, though curious, is not new. The oyster has the power of closing the two parts of its shell with considerable force, by means of a strong muscle at the hinge.

Surewsbury.—A county meeting is to be held on Wednesday, to consider of a loyal address to his Majesty, in pursuance of a requisition signed by Lords Clive, Bradford, Dungannon, Hill, Killmorey, Combermere, Mr. Kynaston Powell, &c.
STANYORD.—The annual festivities at Belvoir Castle excite additional interest this season, in consequence of the arrival of his Royal Highness the Duke of York and his Grace the Duke of Wellington. The Aldermen and Corporation of Grantham, in full processson, presented the freedom of their ancient borough to these illustrious personages, on Wednesday, at Belvoir, and were most graciously received.

Whitehaven.—On Friday, the birth-day of the Earl of Lonsdale was celebrated in this town, with every mark of respect at the Black Lion Ian, and the Golden Lion Inn.

WINDSOR.—The furniture belonging to the Princers Sophia, which was deposited in the Lower Lodge, attached to the Castle, has been removing from here within these few days to London, the residence of her Royal Highness.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

On Monday, a melancholy occurrence happened at the house of Dr. Uwins, in Bedford-row. The family were alarmed with the cry of fire," which was discovered to proceed from the two pair back room, in which a young lady, a relation to the family, and her servant maid, slept, and before the door of the room could be opened, the unfortunate young lady, who was only 16 years old, and her servant, threw them-selves out of the window, and falling into the area, they were taken up in a state of insensibility. The young lady had both her legs broken, and the servant maid had also several bones fractured. They were both carried to the hospital with very little hopes of recovery. How the fire communicated with the led and window-curtains we were unable to learn, but on the doors being forced open, they were found to be on fire. The engines arrived; but happily the fire was got under with a few pails of water.—We regret to got under with a few pails of water.—We regret to state, the young lady died on Wednesday; and an inquest was held on the body on Thursday, at the Goldene Lion, Warwick-place, Bloomsbury, when the evidence adduced was to the same effect as above stated; and he Jury returned a Verdict of -Killed by a fall in attempting to escape from fire.

A pistol shot was, on Sunday night last, discharged into the house of Mr. Couts, at Highgate. It passed through the green-house, and entered the parlour. The act is supposed to have been done by accident, not with any evil intention.

Bunglaries. Two burglaries were committed on Monday evening at Chelsea: one at the house of Mr. Thorpe, in Mitre-row, which was broken into by scaling a twelve-foot wall, and cutting the shutters of the kitchen, by which the thieves removeds the bolts. They succeeded in carrying off, unobserved, a dozen tea-spoons, and other portable articles of less value. Another burglary was committed at the house of Mrs. Gee, of Leeson-street. Here the robbers were less fortunate, as a terrier dog alarmed the family, and they escaned with a great coat and a tea-caddy. The Limen reon. Some of the prisoners confined in the thickes got down the area, and forced the door.

"a" The Price of this beautiful Volume searcely exceeds half the charge of the other Editions of the Novels of this Author.

The first intention of this Publication was formed several years ago, and then announced to the Public through the medium of the Quarterly Review. At that period, an ample collection of materials for the work was made, with great assiduity and care, and a very great expense insurred towards its speedy completion.

Circumstances, wholly uninteresting to the Public, have retarded the Publication till now.

Circumstances, wholly uninteresting to the resolution till now.

It is intended to reprint, in the present form, the Works of the best of the English Novellists, together with selections from the German, French, and Italian, some of which are already translated, and others in the course of translation,) with Memoirs of the Anthors' Lives, and Criticisms on their Writings, prefixed. The Works of each Author will be published separately and complete, in a single volume, as in the present instance, or in one or two more, as the length of the compositions shall require.

present instance, or in one or two more, as the aging.

this not the Publisher's intention to unlarge, either on the value of bis materials, the correctness of his typography, or the heautiful execution of his work. The singh source from whence he derives his Literary aid, will be at once recognized; and the present Volume is offered as a specimen of the style in which the others will be executed.

AT a MEETING of MERCHANTS, BANKERS, TRADERS

Sir ROBERT WIGRAM, Bart, in the Chair

Sir ROBERT WIGRAM, Bart in the Chair
It was moved by T. REID, Esq. and seconded by JOHN WHITMOR B.
Esq. and carried unanimously, That the following Declaration be adopted by this Meeting, be signed by the Gentlemen present, and lie for signatures at the City of Loudon Tavern, London Tavern, King's Head, Poultry, and London Coffee-House, Esingate-lill:—

We, the amdersigned Merchauts, Bankers, Traders, and others, of London, feel ourselves imperiously called upon in the present state of the Country, to declare these our deliberate sentiments, earnestly and anxidence, be averted, and that now, when no foreign enemy assails us, we may be permitted to enjoy, uninterruptedly, the blessings of domestic peace.

dence, be averted, and that now, when no foreign enemy assalls us, we may be permitted to enjoy, uninterruptedly, the blessings of domestic peace.

We declare it to be our firm and unalterable purpose to uphold our venerable and happy Constitution, composed of King, Lords, and Commons, against all and every attempt to alter or subvert it, and to maintain in all its purity our holy and revered Religion, feoling the most assured conviction, that the greatest share of human happiness is to be derived from the one, and the best and strongest hopes of eternal folicity from the other. We view with poignant regretand abhorrence, the measures which abound to destroy these sources of present enjoyment and of future consolation; and we trust the laws will be enforced to deter and to punish all who, by their factions or blasphemous proceedings, wish to deprive the subjects of this great and free Country of these inestimable blessings—blessings handed down to us by our ancestors—cherislied by the wise and virtuous of our own time, and, in our minds, suited to the welfare and happiness of the generations which are to follow us.

Resolved unanimously. That the following Gentlemen, who are now present, le a Committee for carrying the object of the Meeting into effect, with-liberty to add to their number:—

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS, Jan. 5 .- Lord Charles Somerset, Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, is now at Parts. During his residence here, Lord Somerset has purchased some magnificent furniture, intended for the hotel of his Government. His Excellency proposes to have this carried there by a French vessel, which may be the more easily done, since the Cape, being declared a free port, a cargo of wines and other French productions would find a ready sale there .- Journal de Paris.

The Sittings of the Peers on Friday and Saturday were entirely occupied with the continuation of the Report respecting the Conspiracy.

BRUNSWICK, Dec. 22.—"His Highness the Duke Au.

gustus of Brunswick, last son of the celebrated Duke Charles William Ferdinand, and uncle of the reigning Duke, General of Cavalry in the service of Hanover, and Great Cross of the Guelphic Order, died on the 18th, in his 43d year." The deceased was of course brother to Queen Caroline, and first cousin to his Britannic Majesty.

ROME, Dec. 28 .- The Duke de Gallo, Neapolitan Minister of Foreign Affairs, passed through this city the day before yesterday, on his way to join the King his master. The Governor of the town of Ravenna had been shot in the public street in open day by an assassin, who escaped detection. The Carbonari are supposed to be the perpetrators of this horrid deed. The deceased incurred the resentment of that faction, by enforcing the rigid execution of the laws provided against them.

LEIPSIC, Dec. 30—Prince Oscar, of Sweden, is expected to make a Continental tour in the ensuing spring. The speculation of an union between this Prince and some German Princess, is revived. The King, Charles John, is getting aged, and it is natural that he should feel anxious about the consolidation of his dynasty.

STOCKHOLM, Dec. 28.—Important negociations are said to be on foot between Denmark and Sweden, the object of which is to insure effectual protection to the commerce of the North. The Cabinet of St. Petersburgh is supposed to take part in these negociations, which may probably lead to a maritime league between the three Northern Powers.

DEC. 28.-Last night the Marquis de Ceralbo repaired to a society which had assembled at the Cross of Malta, to break it up, conformably to the law of the 8th of November last. The Members made open resistance, and the authority of the laws was completely defied, and the greatest tumult ensued. They read the Address of the Common Council to George IV. requiring him to dismiss his Ministers. The reading was loudly applauded, and a petition of similar tenor to King Ferdinand was instantly drawn up, and received numerous signatures. To-day, (28th) very severe measures have been taken to prevent the renewal of similar scenes. The tribunes were seized at the Coffee houses; but the people besieged the authorities whilst executing this measure. The Na-tional Guard is under arms, and we are very fearful that serious proceedings will ensue .- Journal de Paris.

The German Papers contain the following Declaration, addressed to the different Governments of Europe by the Allied Sovereigns at Troppau, relatively to the

"The overthrow of the order of things in Spain, Portugal, and Naples, has necessarily excited the cares and the uneasiness of the Powers who combated the revolution, and convinced them of the necessity of putting a check on the new calamities with which Europe is threatened. The same principles which united the great Powers of the Continent to deliver the world from the military despotism of an individual issuing from the revolution, ought to set against the revolutionary power which has just developed itself.

"The Sovereigns assembled at Troppau with this intention venture to hope that they shall attain this object. They will take for their guides, in this great enterprise, the treaties which restored peace to Europe, and have united its nations

Without doubt the Powers have the right to take, in common, general measures of precaution against those States, whose reforms, engendered by rebellion, is openly opposed to legitimate governments, as example has already demonstrated, and especially when this spirit of rebellion is propagated in the neighbouring States by secret agents. In consequence, the Monarchs assembled at Troppau have concerted together the measures required by circumstances, and have communicated to the Courts of London and Paris their intention of attaining the end desired, either by mediation or by force. With this view they have invited the King of the Two Sicilies to repair to Laybach, to appear there as concillator between his mis-guided people and the States whose tranquillity is endangered by this state of things; and as they have resolved not to re-cognize any authority established by the seditious, it is only with the King that they can confer.

"As the system to be followed has no other foundation than treaties already existing, they have no doubt of the assent of the Courts of Paris and London. The only object of this system is to consolidate the alliance between the Sovereigns; it has no view to conquest, or to violations of the independence of other Powers. Voluntary ameliorations in the Government will not be impeded. They desire only to maintain tranquillity, and protect Europe from the scourge of new revolutions, and to prevent them as far as possible."

"My DEAR BROTHER, &c.—If, under existing circumstances, my heart could give vent to an effusion of joy, it would certainly burst forth on the reception of the letter from your Imperial Majesty, dated Troppau, and those from the Al-hed Sovere.gus assembled in that town. " I shall feel peculiar pleasure in seeing your Majesty once more; in becoming personally acquainted with the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia; in owing to their wisdom and to their benevolence the tranquillity of my States; and my most gratifying occupation will be to inspire into every member of my family the sentiments of gratitude with which my heart is penetrated.

"FERDINAND.

Cosenza, Dec. 20.—On the 29th Nov. last, about half past six in the evening, (un'ora e mezzo della notte), there suddenly appeared, on the west of the horizon, a luminous body, more brilliant than the moon at its full. This body had the figure of a dragon. After passing with great velocity across the horizon, it changed into a dark and thick cloud. After three or four minutes several violent flashes of lightning burst from the cloud, which, after playing awhile through the air, died away. In the moment of their disappearance a long and loud peal of thunder was heard, and a considerable motion was felt in the air. The cloud then took a triangular figure, and in the air. The croud then took a triangular nearly, and rolling rapidly to the east, disappeared. On the following morning the mountains to the East were found covered with snow, although the weather had been very mild. Where it exploded there remained a long via latter near the cloud. This luminous body was visible at Naples, but none of its characteristics were observed; in some parts of Calabria, and on the part of Sicily opposite, we have heard that its appearances were more singular than those above described.

INSPRUCK, Dec. 27.—Letters from Naples of the 15th say, that the fermentation which had prevailed during some days had subsided. The assemblage of the popular lace in the public places, which had excited so much alarm, had ceased.

SWITZERLAND, Dec. 30 .- It is asserted that France begins to act a more important part than hitherto in the general politics of Europe, and that its influence is increasing. Persons who pretend to be initiated in the mysteries of diplomacy affirm, that France has formed a closer union with England than any other power; and that M. Decazes has commenced in London, negociations of the highest importance, the consequences of which are likely to be very interesting.

Lisbon, Dec. 30 .- State Paper .- The Portugueze nation has published a very long and wellwritten Manifesto, addressed to the Allied Sovereigns, and the People of Europe. It professes a sincere and ardent desire to maintain the political and commercial relations of the kingdom with all the Governments of Europe entireadverts to the removal of the Prince Regent, (now King John VI.) in 1807, to the Brazils, which placed the kingdom in the most critical situation .- Portugal, separated from her Sovereign by the vast expanse of the ocean, deprived of all resources from her transmarine possessions, and of all the benefits of commerce by the blockades of her ports, and governed at home by a hostile force, which was then thought invincible, seemed to have reached the final term of its political existence, never to be replaced in the rank of independent nations. With the assistance of the Allies, however, Portugal recovered its political existence at the expence of the most painful sacrifices. In conclusion the Manifesto remarks, that it would be most afflicting to the Portugueze nation, if the powerful Sovereigns, with whom it has always been on the terms of friendship, should abuse their power to impose laws on it, or to repress the noble efforts of a nation, incapable by it geographical position, of troubling the peace of other people—which has never interfered in the internal concerns of others. They, however, anticipate a more fortunate result.

GIBRALTAR, Dec. 18.—Yesterday was a scene of riot and confusion at St. Roque, in this neighbourhood, on the occasion of electing a corridor (Magistrate) and Town Council. The country people all assembled in the morning, in the church, where, it seems, the election takes place, when an affray began between these and the townsinen and Militia: knives, muskets, and bludgeons being the weapons. The former chased the militia away, and order was only restored by a company of the regiment of Gallicia, quartered in the neighbourhood, who came in: the casualities are, one man killed, and four wounded. There seems to be a spirit now brooding among the lower orders in Spain that may produce fatal consequences hereaster: they wear publicly in their hats, a green ribband, with the inscription—"The Constitution or Death."

According to the most recent accounts from the Coast of Barbary, a contest for the sovereignty is carrying on in the Empire of Morocco. The new candidate for the throne is Muley Ishmael, the son of the celebrated Muley Yezzied, and nephew to the reigning Emperor. The struggle is likely to be of short duration, as the army have declared for Muley Ishmael, who has been publicly proclaimed, and crowned in Fez, where he has taken up his residence. The old Emperor has not, however, been yet dispossessed of his power, so that there are two Emperors-one at Fez, the other at Morocco. An official announcement has been issued by the Governor of Gib-raltar, declaring the coast of Barbary free from the plague. The disturbed state of the country, is likely, however, for some time, to throw impediments in the way of the commercial intercourse with Morocco.

Letters and papers from the Cape of Good Hope to the 22d of October, are satisfactory in all points of view, but especially with reference to the new settlement at Algoa Bay. His Excellency the Governor, Sir R. S. Donkin, was taking some effectual measures to place the coinage of the colony upon a better footing, and on the 13th of October he issued a Proclamation for destroying a very large quantity of base money. He has also taken mea sures to communicate to the new settlers from England the full benefit of the Courts of Justice established in that quarter of the world.

I.AW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BRNCH, JAN. 10. . Weldon v. Bulcomb.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, an East India Captain, to recover of the defendant, a merchant at St. Helena, 1211. for goods soll and delivered, and money received for his use.

The defendant plended, that he was not liable; and secondly, the statute of limitations.

The plaintiff delivered to the defendant on his touching at St. Helena, in 1809, several sorts of goods. Among other articles 120 bolts of Bengul convers, which the defendant was to sell at St. Helenn, if he could get 41. 10s. per bolt. If it would not fetch that sum, it was to be sent to Mr. Amyott, the plaintiff's agent at the Cape of Good Hope, and to be represented as Portugueze goods. In 1810, when the plaintiff again touched at the Cape, the defendant delivered him an account of 80 holts sold on the island, and stated that the other 40 had been sent to Rio Janeiro, and sold there to a person named Hall, residing in England. The defendant gave the plaintiff an order on Mr. Hall, to receive the proceeds, amounting to 1211.5s. 8d. Plaintiff took the order, but never found Mr. Hall. He consequently brought his action to recover payment of the defendant, on the ground of his having disposed of the goods contrary to his instructions, which were, to send them to the agent at the

The Chief Justice was of opinion the plaintiff had not adopted the right form of action. He was consequently noa-saited, with leave to move the Court to set it uside, if any ground remained for the application.

HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT AND COURTS OF LAW.

The galleries erected in the House of Lords for the temporary accommodation of the Peers during the pro-ceedings on the Bill of Pains and Penalties against her Majesty, have been removed, and the workmen are now actively engaged in reducing the edifice to its former Some alterations are also in contemplation as to the situation of the King's Throne. This magnificent piece of workmanship has been taken down, and is, we understand, to be re-erected close to the wall, instead of being, as hitherto, a short distance from it. The steps approaching the King's chair are to be raised. The advantage to be gained by these arrangements is the exten-sion of the space hitherto appropriated to the Members of the House of Commons during the proceedings of the Peers, which, on important occasions, has been found infinitely too much confined. There will be one drawback, however, to this advantage, which, we are satisfied, many of the Noble Lords will not fail to deplore, We allude to the exclusion of the ladies from the avenue behind the Throne, from whence they have heretofore been permitted, "under the rose," to listen to the discussions of this branch of the Legislature. The only place which will be now left for this indulgence, will be in the folds of the curtains by the side of Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt's box.

In the House of Commons too, the backs of the benches have been raised about eight inches, by means of an iron rail, which is covered with green cloth. The principal alterations in progress, however, are in the Committee Rooms; of which several new ones are to be created. This desirable end is to be attained by taking possession of the large stone building lately occupied by Mr. Leigh, who has succeeded the late Mr. Hatrell, as principal Clerk of the House of Commons, to whose residence he has removed. This building fronts Westminster Abbey, and possesses many commodious rooms, into which convenient passages are opening.

Connected with these alterations are the preparations for erecting the new Courts of Chancery and King's Bench. The old Courts were taken down preparatory to the Co-ronation feast in Westininster Hall, and have not since been restored. By the projected alteration the hall-will retain its ancient magnificent size and appearance, and will still preserve its character of being the largest room in Europe; and from the admission of additional lights from the roof, and from the large windows, will present a lively contrast to the gloomy aspect by which it was characterized in former times. The new Courts of Chancery and King's Bench will be erected on the north side of the hall, in a line with the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer; and, like those Courts, will have two modes of ingress, one from the space opposite St. Margaret's Church, and the other from the hall. The former devoted to the admission of the Judges and Counsel, and the latter to attorneys, suitors, and witnesses. To afford room for these improvements, some of the old Committee-rooms of the House of Commons, as well as part of Mr. Leigh's house, the old Treasury Chamber, and some other antiquated buildings will be removed. The alterations will be made with a due regard to economy, but at the same time, in a substantial and convenient manner;

The eastern end of Westminster Hall, which has been so long under repair, is nearly completed. The architectural ornaments have been restored, and the strictest regard to the gothic original, and the whole structure will undergo a complete repair.

It is with the most poignant regret we have to communicate the melanchely fate of the Absona transport of 328 tons, under the charge of Lieut. Mudge, of the Royal Navy, which sailed from Greenock, in October last, with settlers for the Cape of Good Hope. On the 23th of November, shout Aoon, in latitude 4 deg. 30 min. North, and longitude 25 deg. 30 min. West, the Absona unfortunately caught fire, and was burnt, under circumstances of the most awful and distressing nature. Out of a crew of twenty-one persons, and one humnature. Out of a crew of twenty-one persons, and one hundred and forty-one emigrants, nieu, women, and children, making a total of one hundred, and sixty-one persons, only forty-nine are saved!! These are happily all safely landed at Lisbon; and have subsequently sailed in the Royal Charlotte mer-chant brig, for Greenock, except ten oriban boys, whom the Gentlemen of the British Factory, at Lisbon, have taken under their kind protection. The fire broke out in the after store room, whilst the Chief-mate was occupied in some necessary business there; and such was the awful progress of the flames, that only three small boats could be got overboard, before the flames consumed the tackies, &c. necessary for lossting out the long bont. In these boats, forty-nine persons were-received on board, with so scanty a supply of provisions, that the consequences must have been almost equally dreadful with the anquences must have been almoss equally accepting with the un-timely fate of those left on board), most providentially fallen in with them at day-light next morning, and received them'on board, in, which they were safely, and hospitably conveyed to Lisbon, after cruising about the fatal spottiff noon, in hopes of descrying some of the interable sufferers, who highe have clung to parts of the wreck, but without sequent. Discovery Ships.—An idea las gone abroad that a newspaper was printed on board the Discovery Ships.

This is er-

paper was printed on board the Discovery Ships. This is er-roneous; no printing materials were on board. The fact was, each officer contributed some article (generally an ingenious with citing to the upon the subject of the expedition) and inguitous at the time to the cost of the crew. The whole-being collected, were fairly copied out by a clerk, and thus was produced a newspaper is writing once a fortnight, to the great amusement the crews. To guard against the effect of the climate, the sailors generally wore masks warmly lined, when upon deck. Upon their return below, they were examined by their measurates, for four there should be any white spots upon their faces. These white spots were the effects of the intense cold. in congesting the blood, and if not attended to, were the fererungeaning the blood, and it not attended to, ware the were unners of mortification; they were therefore immediately rubbed with snow, until the quick circulation returned. For a long period previous to their return, they laboured under a scarcity of provision. Four pounds, only, of meat weekly were allowed to

THE political horizon is calm, but it is the calm that precedes the storm: the parties are almost in the presence of each other, and hold their breath in mutual anxiety. For us, who care for no party, except as its interests may appear connected with those of the country, we await with more curiosity than anxiety the parliamentary contest.

We believe—we are assured, that the immense majority of the country, and, of course, a great majority of its representatives are convinced of the guilt of the QUERN; and, if that great question be decided, and acted upon in a manner consistent with what is due to the honour of the King and the public morals of the nation, every thing else is of inferior consideration.

JOHN BULL has his partialities, and perhaps his prejudices: he is grateful to the present Ministers for the glory and the peace which their measures achieved, and he has felt indignant at the means which the Whigs were always too ready to employ to impede and trammel those exertions.

But allowances must be made for human errors; and, above all, for the uncertainty of political judgments: but that, upon which there ought to be, can be, no doubt-upon which the view and opinion of every man must be clear, distinct, and decisive, is the necessity of upholding the Monarchical Constitution, the Protestant Religion, the National Character, and the Public Morality, which have been hitherto the boast and the blessings of this favoured

There is no doubt that ingenious orators on all sides will split hairs; and pick holes, and criticise, in this or that detail the conduct of their antagonists: one will think the Queen ought not to have been omitted from the Liturgy, but will be far from saying that she ought to be replaced: another will approve of the omission, but assert that, after her trial, she should be reinstated: some will think that Lord Liverpool did not give up the Bill soon enough, and others, that he ought not to have given it up at

Nice distinctions will be taken between degradation and divorce—between circumstantial evidence and positive proof; and all these various arguments will be discussed according to the personal ingenuity, or the political interests, of the speakers, and how the greater part of them will be determined Joun Bull neither knows nor cares.

The great—the real question is this, and this alone—is the Queen fit to remain at the head of the female society of England? is she fit to wear the unsullied diadem, to enjoy the homage of public respect, and to share in the devotion of our public prayers? in short, is she guilty or is she not?—is she the most injured, or the most profligate of women?-if injured, redress the injustice, and place her on the Throne by the side of her Husband and Sovereign-if profligate, be just to that Husband and Sovereign, and preserve his Person and his Throne from such a contamination.

No trimming, no shuffling, no sophistry-guilty or not guilty she must be; and the distinct treatment of guilt or of innocence she must receive.

It seems to us as if the Government had either some difficulty in finding a successor to Mr. Canning, or wished to keep his office open for his future return:—the friends of Mr. Peel deny, we are told, that any offer was made to him; and the friends of Mr. Canning repel very warmly, the insinuation that his resignation is not sincere and final. Those Gentlemen know their own purposes best; and to be sure the state of public affairs cannot make office very desirable either to Whigs or Torics: but we do feel that we are come to a crisis in which every man must take his part; and public opinion, like the law of the Athenians, will oblige every public man to enlist himself on one side or the THE CARRIAGE AT THE DOOR, WHILE stantially guilty, and of him (if any such there be) with neu Marrie.

course is clear; and we venture to assert, that how ever ingenious politicians may flatter themselves, all their shifts and turns, and all their quirks and quiddities will be baffled and defeated, and they will at last be obliged (if they have any respect for their character) to come to the decision—Guilly or Innocent.

> JOHN BULL TO THE QUEEN. MADAM,

Insolence is the characteristic of underlings. During the last three weeks I have addressed several questions, to several of your dependants, to which they have not thought proper to make any reply.

If this be what those persons call treating John Bull with contempt, their system is a mistaken one: every question I ask about you is founded on a foregone fact-overy question unanswered stands registered in the minds of the thousands who read this paper as an undeniable truth; either, therefore, your hirelings have not sufficient consideration for you to take the trouble to answer my public calls, or my public calls are unanswerable.

As I have not the slightest respect for your Majesty, I would have it distinctly understood that I forbore to address you personally, merely in hopes of getting answers to my questions from people more likely to speak the whole truth than the party principally implicated; but, as they have deserted you, either from carelessness of your best interests, or from the badness of your case, I must direct myself more immediately to your Majesty.

You stand upon hollow ground, great Lady: Brougham, your pure, disinterested partizan, Brougham, was ready to abandon you, if Ministers would have had him-that fact you know.-That you have no very high opinion of the Broughams your own story of the three hundred pounds, and James, and the scurrilous language you have used, when speaking of him, clearly prove. You see, Madam, I know your secrets: but secrets they shall soon cease to be, unless, as indeed I expect your Majesty should, by a speedy and prudent retreat, relieve us from the most disgusting discussions which ever disgraced a nation.

It has been the fashion to abuse all Italian witnosses, except your own. But I can assure your Majesty, that why the Countess Oldi was not produced in your defence, is known out of Brandenburgh House as well as in it. Delicacy forbids my explaining my meaning, not indeed delicacy towards your Majesty, but towards the moral and respectable persons who may read this paper: you will see that I know what I am talking of. The question touching the hospital at Milan, in which the Countess was a patient, was the stumbling-block which neither the malevolence of one of your legal advisers nor the impudence of another could get out of the way.

I shall now put a serious question to you with respect to your conduct towards the house of Marionetti, at Milan.

A report is prevalent that you one day desired to close your account at your bankers, and directed the firm to give you up your book, vouchers, &c. which they, relying on the honour of a Princess allied to the Throne of England, did not hesitate to do; that you took the vouchers, and the balance being considerably against you, you paid into the house three bills of exchange on London, and received a large sum, the amount of difference between the balance due by you and the bills so paid in.

The story goes on to say, that immediately after doing this, you despatched a letter to your bankers here, directing them not to accept these bills. At this every man and woman who hears it starts back and wonders; those who are still your partizans pronounce it a falsehood—a calumny—an oppression—a libel. It may be so; but your Majesty will doubtless condescend to clear yourself of the imputation, which, though we do not find it alluded to in any of the numerous addresses which you have received, nor in any of the brilliant answers which you have given, is to be found recorded; not in a fable book, or a newspaper, or by an Italian witness, but in a document not usually given to falsehood— in a bill filed against you in our ourt of Chancery in the year 1817 there the co rious may see a detail of this honest and honourable transaction which, when divested of its legal formalities and technicalities, comes to neither more nor less than the thing which I have just written.

Is it not true, pure Star of Innocence, that you tendered a letter of credit on your banker in London, and received a large sum upon it from the Scotch agent at Trieste-is it not true that that letter of credit turned out to be a forgery? We want no foreign witnesses: call your London bankers into Court, and hear their ovidence.

But, Madain, there is, if you recollect, another bill in Chancery filed against your Majerty; far be it from me to designate the crime which is there crivilly charged against you: the whole world knew the story, but they have almost forgotten it—had it quite slipped their memories you would not be ill pleased: — it relates to the extraordinary mode in which the Duke of Brunswick's name has been obtained to some papers of material importance, and intended profit to you.

In my first Number, while commenting upon your sympathy for that old offender, Sarah Price, I observed, generally, (which I shall now take leave to notice particularly to you,) that your Attorney-General has obtained more than one extension of the time allowed you to reply to this bill, on the plea that you have been too closely occupied with matters of greater weight. It appears, however, that you are in a great measure relieved from your most important pursuits; and, I must suggest, that before you exhibit yourself as the advocate of charity to the apprentices at the Mansion House, it would be as well if you could give a little time to a case in which you are so seriously involved. I shall, for the present, quit this part of the subject, because I have other and equally important observations to make.

You will perceive that I put some questions to Colonel and Lady Charlotte Lindsay, about the house at Bayswater—the house Lady Charlotte took at your desire, in your name, avowedly for a laundry, which, as you know, never was used for a laundry, but as a place of meeting for you and young Sapio the singer—these questions are unanswered—I know they must remain so—unless you are brought to confess them. Do not imagine that I am not aware of all your conduct, from the degrading scenes at Monk Lewis's lodgings-and your assignations with Lord Henry Fitzgerald at the Lyceum; was it purity-virtue-or mere accident, that threw you night after night, and week after week, into the society of Lord Henry at that place ?-that it was not the last, the fact of his Lordship's nightly watchings amongst lamplighters, actors, and scene-shifters, clearly proves—that neither of thre others could have brought you to the meeting, was still more plainly shewn by your conduct towards him, which has more than once driven decent company from the opposite side of the house, and would not have been tolerated in the upper boxes of the same theatre.

There is no evasion for you here—you may deny, if you please, your having been hissed out of the theatre at Naples; for although fifty people saw that adventure, the majority of those who did sot, is necessarily very great—but here—in the instance of the Lyceum and Lord Henry Pitzgerald (who, let us never forget, is the Duke of Leinster's uncle), hundreds of people have seen that which I describe, and the feeling of surprise with them, is not that your Majesty was hissed out of a Neapolitan playhouse, but that you have been allowed to commit your indelicacies in an English one with impunity.

I have two objects in thus addressing you. The first is to set you right with the world; that we may hear nothing about your purity and innocence; and that the people who are led politically to uphold your cause, may fairly judge of your claims to their support, in any character besides that of the head of a faction opposed to the King and the government: and the other, to skew up to you all your pretended friends and adherents, so that you may duly appreciate their professions of attachment to you for any other quality than that of being a powerful tool in their hands—and this, please God, I will do so effectually, that the name of partizan of Queen Caroline instead of being a synonime for a republican or revolutionist, shall become the byc-word in the mouths of the people for a fool or a driveller.-Madam, I am, (as courtesy dictates) your obedient fellow subject,

JOHN BULL.

I care not a louse.
For John Cam Hobbouse;
He may fume and may fret,
And may toady Burdett,
He may think himself witty,
Cut a dush in the city,
Vent vulgar abuse,
Or lifs like a goose;
To Saint Paul's he may ride,
With a sword by his side,
Or may follow the Queen
Like a Jack on the green;
But a Palace-yard fool,
Or a Radical tool,
Do whatever he will,
He's a little man still.
He'll be laughed at and scouted,
Be fritmp'd and be flouted,
Irmebla his fate.

Bait early or late, He will live in a soutter,

And die in a gutter.

THE PROPHECY.

THRATRICALS:

Two Tragedies have been produced this week. One on Monday at Drury-Lane under the title of Montalto, and one on Tuesday at Covent-Garden, under that of Mirandola.—We have no room for any lengthened criticism upon either of them in this number; they appear to possess nearly equal merit, and to have received nearly similar receptions.—The one at Drury-Lane is written by a Mr. Haines, that at Covent-Garden by a Mr. Procter; but both these authors appear duly to appreciate their own works, for the one most carefully conceals his name, and the other prints his play under a feigned one.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

The following parody of an excellent and curious old song appears, to us, to deserve the attention of all who can read, and the voices of all who can sing. The air, which is very peculiar, was sent us, and we regret that we are not able to print it, but we trust the whole will be published in a separate shape.

HUNTING THE HARR.

Would you hear of the triumph of purity?
Would you share in the joy of the Queen?
List to my song; and, in perfect security, Witness a row where you durst not have been:
All kinds of Addresses,
From collars of S.S.
To venders of cresses,
Came up like a fair;
And all thro' September,
October, November,
And down to December,

They hunted this Hare!

First there appear'd, with the title of visitors,
Folks, whom of fair reputation they call,
Who, in good truth, and to candid inquisitors,
Seem to have no reputation at all;
The Woods', hen and chicken,
And Dammenwon-stricken,
And Ressells, come thick in,
To greet the fat dame;
And the Duehess of Leiksen,
(Well behav'd while a spinster,)
With drabs of Westminstor,
Now mixes her name!

Ment, in great state, come the Countess of TARKERVILLE;
With all the seas and the daughters she had;
Those who themselves are annoy'd by a canker vite,
Joy to discover another as bad:
So Lady Moll came on,

So Lady Moll came on,
With ci-devant GRAMMORT,
And (awful as Ammon)
Her eloquent spouse!
And frothy GREV BENNETY,
That very day se'nuight,
Went down in his dennett,
To Brandenburgh House.

Bold, yet half blushing, the gay Lady Junaur,
Drove up to the entrance—but halted outside,
While Surrow's fair tribe, from the banks of the Mersey,
Who promis'd to keep her in countenance—suvan!

But this never hinders
The sham Lady Lindons,
Who stoutly goes in doors—
Old Russ does the same;
Great scorn of all such is!—
But Budyonne brave Duchess,
To get in her clutches,
Delighted the dame.

Lank Lindy Annu brought her sister of Southment;
The least she could do for the wages she clears:
If the merits of either were up to the Hammer set,
They'd fetch much the same as Lord Aucuman.

Not so Lady SARAH,
For she, under care o'
Some Hume or O'MEARA,
Lies sick in her bed;
Yet her name they twist in
By means they paraist in
Of even collisting
The names of the dead!!!

Then came the premature wife of her pen-man,
Her guide, her advisor—in short, Mrs. Braugham,
And then the spare rib of Go-sin-no-more Danman,
And sweet Mrs. Williams, and young Mrs. Hume; Old Barder, and Taylor,
And Hood, could not fail her.
But the Muse can't detail, or Discuss what remains;
Except Mrs. Wilder.

Was the pride of DEVAYNES.

Who, for roast and for boil'd,

While as cook-maid she toil'd,

The Rans-King, fearing the tames should over Scads has his profest, waster, and any in-Honoured by courtesy, he his gover reduced, But soither by nature, come sentitled Grav, With the Norwich Archdoscon, Who thinks he may speak on Because, like a beacon, His head is so light; And sea-beaton Madocas, And some other and dogs, Who (like stinking haddocks) By rotting grow bright.

Danisels of Marybone, deck'd out in erticles,
Borrow'd of brokers for shillings and peace;
The eye of vulgarity any thing amart tickles;
Drabs love a ride et another's expence;
Go swarming like leaches,
In ten hackney coaches,
They make their approaches
And pull at the bell;
And then they flaunt brave in,
Preceded by Chaven,
And, clean and now shaves,

Topographical Gall.

Next came a mothy assemblage of what I call Mummers, and mountabanks, wildly array's;
Hod-men, and coel-bravers, landmen and coutical,
Tag-rag and bobtail, a strange masquerade!
A rout of sham sailors,
Escap'd from their jailors,
As ses-bred as tailors,
In Shropshire or Wilts:
But mark Oldi's smile and hors,
Greeting, as Highlanders,
Half a score Mitha-Expans,

Shiv'ring in kilts!

None and Moore are the pink of her quality,
Judge what must be the more mean particula!

What sweepings of kennels—what scume of rescality—
Hir'd and stir'd to enact artisane;
Sham paintens, and stainers,
Smiths, coopers, cordwainers,
And glaziers—chief gainers.

In such a turnoil,
Tho' chandlers and joiners,
And forgers and coiners,
And pocket-purloiners,

Verdant green-green, all mountains stack-anies,
(Lately called Guildfords, in hopems of Pains,)
Sweet agraphs of Effingagete, tipesy its Encompage, Roll'd in like porpoises, heels over head?
And the better to charm her,
'Three tinkers in armour,
All hind by HARRER,
Brave Thistlewood's friend;
Those stout men of metal,

All share in the spoil.

Brave Thistlewood's fries Those stout men of metal, Who think they can settle, The State, if a kettle 'They're to able to mead.

Next come the PRESENTS—Whitechappi (when if over bury) Suds accides to hom Dr. Princounce have;
Cracknells from Cowes—avoet simple from Providing—Rump steaks from Dublin—and college of brawn—
A pig,—and a blanket—

A pig,—and a blanket—
A sturgeon from Stangate—
The denors all thank-ed
By Royal desire!
Old Para gave his benison
To Paratus's verison.
But the pengalist of Trinavaox
He threw in the fire:

Last came the Lack-wif address of Sir Busanav, Bearing the Crown with his stacesse wrath! "Tefould look, I fear, too like a libel, to unbury All the exploits of this Relight of the Reth.")

From service retreated;

By Wilson out-prated;
Like him, self-created;
His star is his sin!
It's spleadour is lest in.
The honours of Austin,
And Howman, who creat in
With faint-away Flynn!

And now e'er T send off my song to the town sellers, ("Twill fetch rather more than the speeches of Hours,)
We'll give one house to het pure privy Councillors, Lounzagrou, Wellers, Willes, Daniels and Buoy on an
With Visand and Connect,

And Hours who would mob it,
And Case who would job it,
As Dad did before;
With WAIRMMAN the prate-man,
And PRARSON the plate man,
And MATTHEW the great man,
Who found us the hare.

Having gone strong the flet ref the Queen's female visitors, and there appearing no probability of any increase to ft, we cannot but tall the serious attention of our readers to the names which we have laid before them in the course of our analysis.

It is to be remarked, not whether the persons named, (with a few exceptions) are disreputable and unfit associates for a Queen at any time, but that at the moment when we are told that thousands of people are assured of her imposence, we find, putting their rank and quality out of the question, a list of Twenty-six names of ladies who have, during seven months, visited Brandenburgh House.

From these twenty-six, we shall, in conclusion, subtract those who were, by various circumstances, influenced in their conduct, and leave the net produce to the judgment of our readers, and the reduce to the judgment of our readers, and the respectability of this illed Majesty.

Mrs. and Miss Wood, wife and daughter of the person who brought the Queen over Duchess of Somerset, sister to the Queen's salaried attendant.

Duchess of Leinster, a regular visitor, diring at the Queen's table.

Mrs. Brougham, Mrs. Wilde, and Mrs. Denman, wives of the Queen's feed counsel

Duchess of Bedford, Mrs. Hume, Lady Hood, Lady W. Russell, Mrs. Madocks, Mrs. Bathurst: forced to go by their HUSBANDS!
but never having gone further than the door

Lady Jersey: forced to go by the Whigs Countess of Tankerville, Lady Mary Bennett, Mrs. H. G. Bennett, and Lady Ossulstone
(a foreigner): could not refuse the solicitations of the men of the family, Lady Caroline

Wrottesly, Lady Tankerville's daughter, and Lady Mary's sister, having been detected in a criminal intrigue with her menial servant
Lady S. Butler (very doubtful if she went)

Mrs. Barber, alias Beaumont 1

Miss ditto, alias ditto 1

Miss-Mr. ditto, alias ditto 1

Mrs. Paylor, and Mrs. Damar 2

So that literally, the force of independent visitors in seven months, amounts to seven ladies, of whom three are of one family.

Now, were the twenty-six persons above-mentioned all of the highest rank, one might be led to suppose that, at a time when she wished to establish to the character, the Queen had been particular as to the admission of names upon her list; but while Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Barber, and her daughters, Mrs. Taylor, and such persons, figure there, it is evident (and we say it without meaning the least personal disrespect to the ladies) that very middling society would have answered her purpose.

Let us fairly and coolly put to this the fact, that with the exception of the distinguished ladies we have mentioned above, not one of the wives or daughters of the ninely-nine noble Lords who politically voted against the Bill of Pains and Penalties hans been near the Queen: Does not this speak volumes?

OBIGINAL CORBESPONDENCE.

DUCHESS OF BEDFORD

WE insert the following extract of a letter from some red-hot champion of the Duchess of Bedford—the part we have omitted is merely complimentary to ourselves. " I dare to hope, that you will kindly give insertion to this, which may tend to correct any mistaken opinion formed by your many readers and friends t, concerning her Grace the Duchess of Bedford. The Duchess did visit the Queen, with sorrow do, I say 1967 bülder Grace is not in t blame: it was, to my certain knowledge, with reluctance, but' by his Grace's command, that the visit was paid we all know a wife must obev: "obey," is the very word used in the sacred ceremony of matrimony; but in proportion as it is the duty of a wife to obey, so is it the duty of the husband not to give improper and foolish commands. The Duchess of Bedfoid is not the only Peer's wife to whom'it has happened to have a husband who has compelled her to do what was most repugnant to her high feelings of propriety, and what injures her reputation in the eyes of those who are ignorant of such base tyranny.

"The Duchess of Bedford is one to whose virtues and excellence he words can do justice. The and of it redaind. Sir, with the most profound and almore respect, your lumble servent."

"TRUE BLUE."

SIR HENRY BUNBURY.

WE had prepared an article on the subject of Sir Henry Bunbary; but as the following Letter answers every necessary purpose, we insert it as we received

SIR,—From your having stated the "new Radical Whig" to be "a sinecure placeman, and to hold a pension during pleasure," it is obvious that you are aware of the remaneration he obtained for his services. Probably you are equally well acquainted with his origin and progress through life, and with the circumstances preceding his retirement from office. But, as it is just possible that some facts may have escaped even your recollection and research, let me suggest—

That his father was supported by a pension. That he was, at an unusually early age, appointed page to her late Majesty Queen Charlotte.

That he received his commission in the Guards (and, I believe subsequent steps of promotion in the army) without purchase.

That he owed his situation as an Under Secretary of State to the countenance of His Royal Highness the Duke of York.

That, holding this office, he was the chief instrument in arranging the extension of the Bath, which gave him an opportunity of conferring on his own merits, and contrary, I believe, to the established rules laid down by himself for other people's cases, the star of a Knight Commander, he not having served in any of the glorious campaigns of the last fifteen years; nor, indeed, do I find him to have been anywhere particularized, except at the battle of Maida, where, as lieutenant-colonel, he had a subordinate command.

That, also holding this office, the seals of the Foreign Department being, at the same time, in possession of his patron, Lord Bathurst, one of the most gross of jobs was effected for his ruined brother-in-law, who received the singular nomination of attacke, with a salary to a legation already fully appointed with secretary, &c., a practeding into which the Whigs would infallibly have called for parliamentary enquiry had not the individual been the nephew of Mr. Fox.

That, when the restoration of peace necessitated a reduction in the department of War and Colonies, this consistent and straight-forward politician, (and that too at the very moment that he was publicly affecting to rejoice in his release from the shackles and "bore" of office) intrigued for the purpose of inducing the Government to dismiss, the regular clerks of the establishment, and to continue the two under Secretaries.

That, foiled in this, the reforming Gentleman did not hesitate at the most strenuous efforts, and most earnest solicitations, for even greater advantages than he has carried with him.

And farther, Sir, let me ask you whether you think the immolation of that gratitude, which he ought to feel to the Royal Family, Ministers in general, and the Earl of Bathurst in particular, be intended as a peace-offering to the Whigs to arert questions as to the legality of his pension of £750 per annum, or merely for the purpose of conciliating their acquiescence in his darling, though covert, object of wresting, by means of his alliance with the DISSENTERS AND RADICALS of the county, the representation of Suffolk from Mr. Gooch.

From the hurry in which I evidently write, you will; of course, conclude, that I have no intention beyond what I profess—that of furnishing you with hints of facts into which you can have no difficulty in inquiring, in case you should not already be au fait at their details.

I am, Sir, your obedient humble servant, R. Y. T.

TO JOHN BULL.

SIR,—Through the kindness of my landlord, Mr. James Brougham, I have been favoured with a sight of your excellent Journal, which, were it not for your jibes and jokes (undeservedly, I assure you) on his brother, Henry Brougham, I should like very well. Mr. H. B. I can assure you, is a Patriot, at heart, whatever blarney he may puff off with the mob. I have heard his brother, on rent-days, or "Saturnalibus," as Mr. James facetiously termed them, declare, that H. only waits for an opportunity to display his love to his Prince and his Country—that in order to this, he would have no objection whatever to serve with any man, or set of men, Whigs or Tories (the latter for choice, on account of indignities received from one Lune, ney, who, wishes, it seems, to keep Mr. leading strings. I think, Sir, between leading-strings. I think, Sir, heivesta, me—I wish not the matter to go farther,—that Ministers might do worse than "tip Mr. Harry the siller." He would stand in the gop gloriously between them and the hungry Scot, Hume, and would pay back "frothy Bennet" in his own coin. Argument is lost on such men. Pit Harry against them: I'll answer for the result.—Your story of the "Silk Gown" is, I doubt not, true enough, and peradventure that of the short conception; but, Sir, ye mistake the lad: he's na ill meaning. Spare him, Sir, spare him say I, or,—verbum sat. Mr. J. B. my worthy neighbour, has made us all merry this Christmas by the pleasant stories he lends us about the Quean. He says, she "swears like a trooper, and does na dislike Madeira"—and refers us to his brother's interview with her at Calais for proof, but excuses her on the plea of "the custom of the country."—Remember, Sir, and believe me yours, JONATHAN THACKSTON.

P. S. A lank, black-hair'd, pale-visaged, sulky kind of a chap, who called himself Lambton, and described himself as "a kind of a laird," and mater of extensive colleries, used to come down with Maister Henry—What has become of the chiel? many a time he nomped with my daughter Nance, who has a great miss of him.—We live rather retired, Sir, and his talk—he having, as Nan says, like friend Harry, "the gift of the gab" proved very welcome to us.—J. T.

to us. T.

SIR—You would oblige me very much, if you could procure for me the name of the gentleman, who was in company with Mr. Alderman Wood's son, when he won a large sum of money of young Mr. Thellusson—my object is not merely curiosity.

Yours, HONESTY.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Allusion being made in a certain debate to some noble Lords having voted for the Bill of Pains and Penalties, who had at times not been present in the course of the trial, a correspondent begs his respects to Lord Grey, and requests he will ask Lord Fitzwilliam and Lord Oxford, whether the one did not vote Mr. Hastings, and the other Lord Melville, guilty? How long the former having been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was absent pending the trial of Mr. Hastings on impeachment? And how many days more than one the latter attended the trial of Lord Melville?

An attempt to get up an address to the Queen from Bicester, has been made by Lady Jersey, through an apothecary and accoucheur at that place, which, malyre the fascinations of her Ladyship, has failed; the son of Galen declaring the whole business to be entirely out of his line.

A Meeting was held of the Nobility, Gentry, Clergy, &c. of the County of Derby on Monday last, to address the King assuring his Majesty of their inviolable fidelity to the Throne, of their firm determination to support the constitution on which our security and happiness depends. The Duke of Devoushire, Sir G. Crewe, T. W. Coke, Esq. M.P. for Derby, Sir R. Wilmot, &c. were present. An amended address was, however, moved by the Duke of Devonshire, which went to condemn the conduct of Ministers.

A Court of Common Council was held on Thursday, at Guildhall; a motion for the purpose of petitioning Parliament for the restoration of the name of the Queen to the Liturgy, and the restitution of all her rights as Queen Consort, having been read,

Mr. Favell was at a loss to guess what opposition could be offered to so reasonable a proposition as that which he had to submit to them—a proposition for restoring her Majesty's name to the Liturgy, and for giving her all her rights as Queen Consort. That which he would call upon the Court to recommend, appeared to him to be but a meature of common policy and of common justice. He moved a series of Resolutions, condemning the late proceedings against the Queen as being against the spirit of our laws, as well as against the procepts of the gospel, and declaring it to be the opinion-of the Court, that the dangers which menuced the country could only be averted by restoring the Queen's name to the Liturgy, enabling her to resume the rights and dignities of her station, and instituting such a rigid inquiry into the origin and proceedings of the Milan dividuals who had been the cuese of measures at once deroga tory to the dignity of the Crown, and injurious to the best into ests of the country.

Mr. Dixon thought this proceeding likely to be more injurious to the cause of the Queen than all her enemies could do: He strongly deprecated the conduct of the Mover on the present occasion, as well as of all others of his way of thinking, in imputing motives so unjust, calumnious, and unfounded, as had been attributed to him and all of his way of thinking. He moved that the question be not put.

After some discussion the original question was carried.

Sir Chas. Bamfylde, High Sheriff of Somerset, has abrogated the orders of the Magistrates against Mr. H. Hunt, now in Ilchester Gaol, restricting his friends from visiting him, of which he lately complained in the Court of King's Bench.

The foreign trade of London must have increased, claring the last half year; for, at a meeting of the London Dock Company, last week, the Chairman reported, that the receipts of the last half year had exceeded those of the former half year by twenty-one thousand pounds.

ARCTIC EXPEDITION -Another Polar expedition is shortly to take place, under the command of Captain Parry, who is appointed to the Fury of 18 guns fitting at Deptford. The second in command is Lieutenant Lyon, promoted to the rank of Commander, and to the Lieutenant Hoppner, the son of the artist of that name, is also appointed to the Recla, and is, with Capt. Lyon, perfectly adequate to take accurate views. Lieutenants Read and Nias, who served in the late voyage to those inhospitable regions, are also appointed to the same ship. Nearly all the seamen who served in the late enterprise have again volunteered their services for this one; and Messrs. Beverley and Flaher are appointed Surgeons of the Fury and Hecla.

Sir George Sitwell's Yorkshire harriers, a few days ago, whilst trying for a bare in the worthy Baronet's covers, found a fine old fox, which lead the staunch little pack a severe chase, and he was at last run into Renishaw Park. and killed in fine style, on the lawn before the mansion, in the presence of the ladies. Out of a numerous field, only Sir G. Sitwell, Captain Wright, and Mr. Thomas, were in at the death.

At the recent anniversary of the Whitehaven Philosophical Society, two specimens of meat cured with the pyrolignerus acid were exhibited by one of the members. They were prepared on the 7th of September, 1819; one was hong up at home, and the other sent out by a vessel to the West Indies, to try the effect of climate upon it, and brought back on the return of the ship to that port. They were pronounced by all present who tasted them to be perfectly fresh, sweet and fit for use, after a lapse of 15 months.

STREPLE CHASE.—The long pending match for 200 guineas a side, which the late frost had prevented, took place on Monday between Mr. Everard, of Farley Hunt, in Hampshire, and Capt. Smith. It was a match on which heavy sums were pending, and distance was about 18 miles, as a bird would fly. The horsemen started at Heckfield, near Hartford-bridge, Hants, the Captain on his Arabian mare, and Mr. Everard on his horse Acton. Betting 5 and 6 to 4 on the marc. The horsemen started off at speed for Sonning Common, in Oxfordshire, the one crossing the Thames by Caversham-bridge, and the other over Sonning-bridge. The Umpires were stationed at the house of J. A. Reeve, Esq. the place to come in at, and the Captain who won it, crossed Cavershambridge, and made through the Park. Mr. Everard's course was too much on one side, and he had to ascend two of the heavy Oxfordshire hills, while his adversary made his play over a level on the summit of the kills. Each had many desperate leaps and much rough road : but the winner did the ground, computed at 22 miles the way he took, in one hour and twenty-eight minutes. Mr. Everard was ten minutes behind him.

QUEER TRAVELLING .- Mr. Huddy, the Postmaster, of Lismore, lately travelled, for a wager, from the town to Fermoy, in a Dungarvon oyster-tub, drawn by a pig. a badger, two cats, a goose, and a hedge hog! ## THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, Jan. 22.

We had only a middling supply of WHEAT at market this morning, having had but few arrivals since this day week; but there being a pretty brisk demand for the finest qualities, the picked samples obtained full as high prices as last week. The supply of Barley was very small; a few fine samples obtained an advance of 1s. per quarter, but for the inferior descriptions there was no demand. (If Oats we had but a small supply, but there was a good demand, and what samples appeared went off briskly at our last prices. In Pras, Brans, &c. there is but little business doing, and no alteration.

SMITHFIELD, Jan. 22. We had but a short supply of all meat at market this merning, and there being a brisk demand the prices of each were higher than they were last week.

The business in the Hay market was dull, and the prices of Clover and Straw experienced a decline. Hay supported our last prices.		• •

ASSASSINATION OF COL. BROWN.
This gentleman some time ago came over to Edition, where, having laparation parallel and the ago came over to Edition, where, having laparation parallel and the common to those calumnies: whilst he was here, he did not conceal his belief that his life would be attempted in Italy; and he mentioned, that he commonly carried pistols for self-defence. He had nearly arranged his affairs at Milan, and had already forwarded all his papers to England, meaning to follow them himself in less then ten days, when, on the 9th nit, refurning late at night and alone from the Opers, he was attacked by two assassins, evidently with no intention of robbery; for, though they disabledhim, they did not attempt to plunder him of his watch, money, or other valuables. The calence defended himself togolutely and a violent struggle ensued, in which he received four money, or other valuables. The calenci defended himself resolutely and a violent struggle ensued, in which he received four wounds in the head, apparently with a knife, and one in the chest, evidently with a stilette. The last would certainly lawe been fatal but for the thickness of his great coat, coat, and waist-coat. As it was, the weapon penetrated on the left side of the chest, and considerably injured the seventh rib.

The columel's friend and physician, Dr. Cleari, was called in, who, on perceiving the nature of the wounds, thought it necessary to require the assistance of an eminent surgeon. Professor Paletta, of the Milan hospital, and both of them continued assiduously to attend their patient.

Three of the wounds in the head were pretty deep, the other slighter; but the most dangerous was the wound in the chest; from which, however, his medical attendants are inolined to think that futal consequences are not to be apprehended. It is attended with acute pain, restlessness, and difficulty of breathing; but these symptoms have been alliviated by blooding.

Upon the whole the colonel is going on as well as could be apprehended; he is in the hands of very scillulemen, and will receive every benefit that care and attention oan give:

The assassing have for the present escaped; but the government has taken every stell or their anneal has taken every see for the present escaped; but the government has taken every see for the present escaped; but the government has taken every see for the present escaped; but the government has taken every see for the present escaped; but the government has taken every see for the present escaped; but the government has taken every see for the present escaped; but the government has taken every see for the present escaped; but the government has taken every see for the present escaped; but the government has taken every see for the present escaped; but the government has taken every see for the present escaped; but the government has taken every see for the present escaped; b ceive every benefit that care and attention on a giver.

The assassing have for the present escaped; but the government has taken every step for their apprehensions.

The above account is contained in a letter from the Duke-of Leeds to the Earl of Liverpool; and a bulletin by Dr. Cleeri, and Professor Paletta, up to 6 p. m. on the 16th instant, has also been forwarded, for the satisfaction of the colonel's friends.

14 to heard that he will himself be able to write by the mark It is hoped that he will himself he able to write by the ment

The following is an extract of a private letter from a person confidentially attached to the household of Col. Browns:

"On Saturday evening, Col. B. attended the Duke of Leeds to the Opera-house. After the entertainment, the colonel unattended and unarmed, was proceeding home, when on a sudden, two rufflans, assaulted him, one of whom pierced him on the left side with a stillette, and exclaimed, "O fatia!" (It is done) A scuffle ensued between them, in the course of which the colonel received four wounds in the head, and was thus left. He was able, however, to find his way home, and immediate recourse was had to several physicians, who, to the exceeding joy of every one, ascertained that none of the wounds were subrish. I swan, one, ascertained that should that this intelligence has been repeatedly confirmed, but that he is recovering."

The narrow escape which this gallant and meritorious effects had, may be further judged of from the following eigening.

stance :- At the battle of Vittoria, where he served as one of the Duke of Wellington's Aides-de-Camp, he received wound in the head, which never closed, but over which he has since worn a silver plate, that had been let into the fracture. Had any one of the four wounds inflicted upon him by the assassius been given in that part of his head, the consequences, in all probability, would have been immediately fatal.

On Sunday evening arrived at Mr. Willis's, St. James street, the Right Hon, the Lord Mayor of the City of Dublin, the Recorder, the City Representatives (Alderman Shaw and Mr. Ellis), Aldermen Darley, Archer, Cash, Berresford, Bloxam, Limes, Abbot, Nugeut, Montgomery, Mr. Sheriff Whitford, the Rev. Mr. Blacker, City Chaplain, Mr. Molesworth Green, Town Clerk, Mr. G. Nugent, Secretary to the Lord Mayor, together with several of the Common Council and Freemen, Officers, and Regalia, to present the unanimous Address of the Corporation of Dibliu to His Majasty.

His Majesty arrived in town on Saturday, and held a Cabinet

Council, which was attended by all the Ministers.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Paris, Jan. 9 .- A considerable discussion arose in the Chamber of Deputies respecting the project of laws for granting six-twelfths of the contributions for 1821 to the government. The measure was opposed by General Donasdieu, and the deby the General "that the Ministers could not be in want of money, as they had lately offered 100,000 francs to one of the members of the Chamber for his support, which proposal, he will be a proposal to the chamber for his support. said, had been rejected with indignation."

The Kooper of the Seals (M. De Serre) demanded that General Donnadieu should prove his assertion. Many other members called out, "Name! Name!"

General Donnadieu, in answer to these calls, repeared the assertion, and affirmed that he had only spoken the truth, and if necessary would name the individual.

The President, at length, with some difficulty, calmed the tunnult and brought back the discussion to its original object. M. Villele, as Minister, defended the subject under discussion, but abstained from noticing the assertion of General Donna dieu. The discussion was altimately adjourned. JAN. 15.—A courier extraordinary arrived here on Saturday from Madrid, with advices to the 4th inst. at which period per-fect tranquility prevailed in that capital. Among the individuals arrested for their refractory conduct, with redebating clubs, are M. Moira; Editor of the Constitutional (which has, in consequence, been dropped), M. Luna, a Guerilla Chief, and the Duke del Parque. # AMERICAN PAPERS.

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.-The Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury was yesterday transmitted to both Houses of Congress. It is of greater length than usual; and, as it will be the ground-work of the fiscal arrangements of the present Session, has been looked for with much interest. Not being able to publish it to-day we have endeavoured to ascertain the general nature of its contents for the information of our readers. We cannot, from a hasty glance, be expected to be very precise in our account of it, but we have, from the surface of the Report, gathered the following facts:—

"The receipts into the Treasury for the present year (including monies received from loans), are stated at 16,819,637 dollars. The payments into the Treasury during the fourth quarter from the same sources are estimated at 3,430,000 dollars, making the total estimated revenue of the present year 20,249,637 dollars; which, added to the balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January last, mounting to 2,071,607, makes the aggregate amount of 22,326,244 dollars. The expenditures for the same period are estimated at 25,054,413 dollars.

"There will, therefore, according to this estimate, be a balance against the Treasury, on the 1st day of next month, of 2,638,169 dollars, the receipts from the customs having fallen greatly short of the amount at which they were estimated in the last annual Report.

"The estimate of the expenditure for the year 1821, was 24,000,000 dollars; the receipts at 16,600,000 dolls." Mr. Crawford, the Secretary to the Treasury, recommends a loan.

A singular and unexpected claim has been set up against us by France, under the treaty for the cession of Louisiana. It stipulates that French vessels are to be received in the ceded territory upon the footing of the most favoured nations. Great Britain having since stipulated with us the admission of the vessels of the two nations, in their respective ports, upon equal terms as to duties, is hereby freed from a heavy duty which France has to pay in Louisiana. It is added, she demands com-pensation for the excess of duty her vessels have paid since those of Great Britain were free from discrimination.

South America, Oct. 10 .- "The army of New Grenada began to move, on the 20th ult. from Cucuta towards Venezuela; the advanced guard consisted of upwards of 4,000 men, under the command of General Urdaneta; General Paez will form a junction with it in December. Morillo is in the neighbourhood of Valencia and San Carlos, where he appears determined that the grand struggle shall take place

"We have had another revolution in the Government of this Province, attended with much bloodshed and the greatest disorders. All business is quite at a stand. British property is, however, held most sacred; nor is there even a suspicion to the contrary harboured."

INDIAN AND COLONIAL.

RIO DE JANEIRO, Nov. 9.-By an arrival at that port from Lima, it was ascertained that Lord Cochrane had arrived on the coast, and landed his troops at Pisco. It will be recollected that Lord Cochrane's squadron conwith 14 transports, having on board 6000 troops.

The following is an Extract of a Letter from Rio Janeiro, dated Nov. 8.:—

The Columbia, Robson, is just arrived from Lima, in 45 days; she brings an account of the landing of the Expedition from Valparulso, at Pisco, on the 11th of September, which induced Captain Robson to sail immediately, fearing that he might be blockaded at Lima by the Chili squadron."

I.AW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OP KING'S BENCH, THURSDAY, JAN. 18.

The Assignces of Bathe v. Holding.

This was an action of trover, to recover of the defendant the value of a large quantity of wine and spirits, which it was alleged the defendant had fraudulently obtained in collusion with the Bankrupt, in contemplation of an Act of Bankruptey. the testimony of the bankrupt Bathe, it appeared that previous to July 1817, he was a retailer of wines and spirits in Precadilly; that he had become acquainted with the defendant, and a person named Probert.—Bathe was involved in some pecu-niary difficulties, and having communicated this circumstance to Holding and Probert, they persuaded him to get rid of his difficulties by an act of bankruptcy. Previous to which, however, they suggested that he should obtain large quantities of wine, which he was to send to the defendant under pretended sales, Holding being about to commence wine-merchant in Devonshire-street, Queen's square; a debt was also to be fabrieated from Bathe to Holding, upon which he was to arrest Bathe, and become peritioning creditor and assignee, under the commission which was then to be sued out against him, Holding and Probert both urging him to adopt this plan, of which they said he might make a very good thing. At length Bathe consented to adopt it. Large quantities of wine and spirits were obtained from different wine-merchants, and sent to the defendant, where they were to continue, and to be restored to the Bank-rupt after he had obtained his certificate, or if sold before that rept after the minor was to be handed over to him, when he should become a clear man. At length the creditors of Bathe became importunate, and by the advice of the defendant the bankrupt gave the defendant his acceptance for 2,000l. Entedated so as to be over due, upon which he was to arrest him, as defendant said it was necessary he should be first in the field. The arrest accordingly took place by appointment, at George's Coffee-house. The thing was settled by Bathe giving a warrant of attorney, confessing, a judgment. This execution the defendant soon after put into the premises of Bathe, who was at the same time arrested by another creditor and went to the Beach. The defendant suffered bim to remain there till some of his bona fide creditors struck a docket against him, and were appointed his assignees. These circumstances Rathe ultimate communicated to his assignees, who upon that information instituted the present proceeding.

A number of witnesses were called to prove that Holding had recommended to the bankrupt to obtain friendly proofs, that is, proofs of fictitious debts under the Commission. That hills of sale were manufactured to suit the circumstances of the case, and old stamps procured to give semblance to the re-celpts, purporting to be given at various times.—Witnesses were called to prove that the defendant had recently been a bankrupt hinself, and had never paid any composition; that he was possessed of no property, and therefore sould not have advanced the 20001, for which the bankrupt's acceptance was given. Proof also was given that Holding had received from the stock of the bankrupt 2000 gallons, and 3372 bottles of port and white wine, and 440 gallons of spirits, to recover the value of which the present action was brought.

Mr. Marryatt, for the defendant, contended, that this was a bona fide transaction, as he should be able to prove to the Jury by the books both of the plaintiff and defendant, and by the bills of parcels and receipts; and he would also call witnesses who were present when the receipts were written, and the sums stated in them paid to Bathe; if he did this, he submitted he should put the matter beyond a doubt. He then called the brother of the defendant to prove the writing of the receipts and the payment of the money, but his evidence was not conclusive for the defendant.—The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff-Damages 20401. costs 40s.

The King v. Mark Nathan.

This was an indictment for perjury. The defendant, it appeared was one of several who were indicted for a conspiracy respecting a bankruptcy. The indictment was found in Sept. 1519, and in Oct. the defendant traversed to the Dec. Sessions, when the day for the trial coming on was fixed, and the cutor and his witnesses were in attendance at the Old Bailey. It then appeared that on the day preceding, the present defendant Nathan and another appeared before Mc. Justice Holroyd, and applied for a certification to remove the indicament into the Court of King's Bench; and to induce the Learned Judge to grant the certiorari, Nuthan swore an affidavit stating that the was found in Sept. This was the perjury assigned.

The defence set up was, that defendant had been led into this error by the misprint of an almanac belonging to one of the parties concerned, as whilst the clerk of the defendant's solicitor was drawing the draft of the affidavit, the defen lant being present, the clerk asked at what sessions the indictment was found, and stated, and correctly, that the bill was found the sessions before last, as with reference to the time at which they were speaking; namely in December. The almanacin question was referred to, and in it there was a natice in the printed list of the sessions of a session mentioned in September, October and November, whereas in fact there was no sessions in November, but this error led the defendant to swear erroneously that the bill was found in October, which on the face of the printed document, appeared to be the session before last.

The Learned Counsel put in this minimum, and called winnesses to prove the facts be had stated.

The Jury found the defendant guing.

DUBLIN, Jan 15.—Sunday night, between the hours of eight and nine o'cleck, Major Sirr, a pon previous information, proceeded with a strong party of Police to a public-house in Winetavern-street; having entered the house, he found there a number of persons assembled, apparently of the class of working tradesmen; they appeared to be in close consultation, with an arrays on the falls, the character or subject of which, whether papers on the table, the character or subject of which, whether political or otherwise, we have not been able to ascertain. The appearances were such, however, as that Major Sirr conceived himself fully warranted in taking into custody the whole umber. After a private investigation atch Hend Police Office, they were sent off to different prisons, some to Newgate, some to Kilmainham, and the remainder to the Richmond Bridewell.

CITY LIMERICK MEETING .- On Monday last, as numerous and respectable a meeting of the nobility, geatry, and inhabi-tants, us we remember within this City, took place at the Thol-sel Court, pursuant to Requisition, for the purpose of expres-sing, in a Loyal and Dutiful Address to his Majesty, their unsing, in a Loyal and Dutiful Address to his Majesty, their unshaken attachment to his Sucred Person, and to our glorious and inestimable Constitution. The Address was proposed by the Lord Bishop of Limerick, and seconded by R. G. Newenham, Esq. Mr. William Roche and Mr. Howley also concurred in the sentiments contained in the Address which was read to the Meeting. The address was then put and entried ananimously and with seclamation.

The Freeholders of the County of Lowth met on Seturday last, when a Loyal Address to his Majesty was agreed to.
The Mayor was in the Chair at the Meeting of the Freeman and other Inhabitants of Londonderry. An amendment to the Loyal Address was proposed, but rejected; loyalry stood proad-ly the order of the day.

The Prince sets out on the journey forthwith.

The English Ambassadress, Lady Vane Stewart, gave a most splendid Dress Ball and Supper, on New Year's Day, to the Allied Sovereigns, on their pussage through Vienna to Laybach. Above 300 persons sat down to supper. Nothing could exceed the magnificence of the dresses upon this occasion, and the entertainment was of the most splendid description.

JOHN BULL.

LONDON, JAN. 21

Ecorism (in spite of the eminent authorities of Cobbett, and Lord Erskine to the contrary) is a tiresome and disgusting failing; and we are as little inclined to trouble our readers with any thing about ourselves, as they would he to receive it; but when we find other persons mixed up with us, who are innocent of any participation in our faults or weaknesses, it becomes a duty to say so much as may exonerate them from an imputation fixed upon them unjustly.

The immediate cause of these remarks, is a speech made at a meeting in the Borough, by a person of the name of Meston, who unnecessarily commences his harangue by informing his hearers that he is not in the habit of speaking in public. This worthy has, it seems, been driven to oratory, by the publication of JOHN BULL, which has of late so disturted him, that he has been unable to refrain any longer from uttering his distress.

It is not to be supposed that, with the thousands who read this Paper, the opinion of Mr. Meston, whoever he may be, can possibly affect us; but the Times newspaper is also in pretty general circulation, and the character which the Borough Wiseacre gives us is eagerly oo ied into that Journal of yesterday; and therefore we think it necessary to reply to the remarks he made, and this we shall do in as calm and temperate a tone as possible.

Mr. Meston talks of the "hireling scribes of the Ministerial faction," and speaks of this Paper as being "hired by Ministers."

There appears to have been a great mistake about JOHN BULL from the beginning, and we never thought it worth while to say any thing about it; but, as far as Mr. Meston's assertions go, we can solemnly and conscientiously declare, and that upon oath if required—one and all of us—Proprietors, Editor, and Printers, that so far from being the hirelings of Ministers, not one of us have ever had the slightest communication with Government on the subject of this publication-that not one of us have even the honour to be known personally, or by name, to any individual of the present Administration; and that this Paper has never, from its commencement to this hour, received the smallest assistance from the Court or Government, in any shape or way.

By Mr. Meston's observations, we find that the Radicals think there is no such thing as conscientious principle in politics, but that it is necessary to be paid for zeal in a cause. We can assure Mr. Meston that there are, thank God! theusands and hundreds of thousands of men as independent of the Government as we are, who are to be found in the day of trial to rally round our beloved King and Constitution without being kired.

The second charge Mr. Mestow brings against us, is of "obscene ribaldry and sourribus falsehoods."

With respect to the former part of the accusation, the peculiar feature of Her Majesty's case is its indelicacy; and wherever she figures decency is set at defiance-alcoping under tents-going undressed to un in ton. All these things, and her rempings and riotings, and hoaxings and trickeries, are so many indelicacies, which in the cause of Justice must be referred too-nay, Her Majesty is sometimes, shielded by her. oven depravity, for many of the things she has done are too bad to be repeated; and so she escapes exposure: this we advance in extenuation of any thing not perfectly pure which has escaped us while discussion ing this disgusting subject.

To the second charge—falsehood—we make no silly vapourings—no blustering about our truth, because it is established; but we will come to much closer quarters with Mr. Moston-if he, or any of his friends, will point out what he may imagine one single falsehood advanced in this paper since its commencement, we will either prove that it is a truth, or apologize for it publicly.— We are old soldiers. Mr. Meston, and we know that it is because we speak the truth, you and your faction are so sore.

We have now done with the subject; and the only matter of congratulation arising from all the Borough orator said, is the fact—that although he abuses JOHN Bull-he takes it in.

Major-General Wilson abused as also; we thank -we hope he will continue to do so.-We would not have him speak'well of us for the world.

Parliament will be opened on Tuesday by His Majesty in person—the amendment to the address is to be moved by Lord Archibald Hamilton.

THE QUEEN'S VISITORS.

We have received so many applications from persons, denying that their female friends have visited the Queen, that we really begin to suspect that no Lady, except the Duchess of Leinster, and perhaps one or two others, have seen her Majesty at all.

We know Lady Jersey has not; we know the Duchess of Bedford has not; we know that Mrs. Brougham has not-that Mrs. Denman has notthat Mrs. Hume has not—that Lady Sarah Butler

The shove is an accurate state of those Peers who opposed the third reading of the Queen's bill.—How many among those Legislators were affected by the question of fear, or expediency, or system, or by any other point than a thorough persuasion in Her Majesty's innocence; we do not now enquire. But, after the triumphant use which has been made of their votes, it may be well to shew the world, how sparingly that persuasion has been exercised beyond the walls of the senatehouse; and how forbearing their Lordships have been in their domestic legislation. Out of seventy two married opponents of the Assi-adultery Bill, Five have sent their wives to visit that calumniated and virtuous Queen, whom they have declared clear of adultery.—But where are theother Sixty seven?

MR. TREODORE HOOK.

The conceit of some people is amusing: and it has been not unfrequently remarked, that conceit is in abundance, when talent is most scarce. Our readers will see that we have received a Letter from Mr. Hook, disowning and disavowing all connexion with this Paper. Partly out of good nature, and partly from an anxie'y to show the gentleman how little desirous we are to be associated universally observed, that papers in their windows an-with him, we have made a declaration which will doubtless be quite satisfactory to his morbid sensibility, and affected squeamisliness. We are free to confess that two things surprise us in this business; the first, that any thing which we have thought worth giving to the public, should have been mistaken for Mr. Hook's, and secondly, that such a person as Mr. Hook should think himself disgraced by a connexion with John Bull.

LIES AND MISREPRESENTATIONS.

His MAJESTY will certainly open the Session of Parliament in person. Having announced this, it is scarcely necessary to take notice of the statement in the Morning Chronicle of yesterday, of His Ma-JESTY'S extreme indisposition to open it, except to inform our readers that there is not the least foundation for it.

We copy the following paragraph from a Morning

Paper:
Our readers, no doubt, remember, that when his Grace the Duke of Wellington was appointed to the Governorship of Plymouth, vacant by the death of the Duke of Richmond, the factious Press seized that, as it seizes every opportunity, to throw suspi-cious slanders on the illustrious individual, whose public services could never be rewarded by that or any other appointments. The silent contempt with which such baseness is generally treated, by the dignitied and honourable, attended these malicious insinuations; and their true and noble answer has only very lately come to our knowledge. is so completely in character with all the life of Bri ton's hero, that we have great delight in recording it. The Duke of Wellington, we are assured, was no sooner invested with the office alluded to, than he transferred its whole revenue, about 3,000l. per annum, to the widow of his late friend and predecessor, whose rank and circumstances rendered this princely action every way excellent. Such conduct would be injured by eulogy—its reward is in the heart."

We copy the following paragraph from the Morn ing Chronicle:—

"We have now authority to state, that the report, so generally spread all over Europe, of a fracas having taken place between Lord Stewart and Prince Metternich, at Troppau, was totally destitute of foundation. It is not easy to conceive how the report could obtain such universal circulation, as the parties were seen to continue in the most intimate and friendly habits. It first came to a Sunday Paper from Berlin, and we received it from a quarter in which the truth was likely to be distinctly known; but we have from authority the most unequi-'vocal and complete denial of all those paragraphs, which are not founded upon a shadow of truth,' and we have great pleasure in vindicating his Excellency, the British Ambassador, from the imputation."

This is very amusing.—The Chronicle pertinaciously insisted upon the truth of the story, day after day, and was terrifically indignant at our "usual shameless effrontery," when we contradicted it. We think it might have begged pardon of our "effrontery," for the slur thus cast upon it. However, as the Chronicle has neglected this obviously prudent course, we shall keep the said "effrontery the alert; and wee befall the Chronicle if our trusty centinel should discover it again attempting to pass off spurious commodities for genuine .- Courier.

The Morning Chronicle has given us a speech of two columns, which it has the impadence to state that the Duke of Bedford spoke at the Bedfordshire Meeting.

Now, it is notorious that the Duke of Bedford emmot speak two sentences; and that on the only occasion in which he is remembered to have made the attempt in the House of Lords, neither his oratory nor his memory could help him to more than the first words of an intended speech. And after blushing, stammering, and blowing his none, he sat down suddenly, to the great distress of all the spectators, and the great relief of himself.

Not to be able to speak in public, is not a fault; and we never should have taken notice of the unconquestable diffidence of the Duke of Bedford, had not the Aforning Chronicle chosen to put a long speech into his mouth, which we, from our acquaintance with his Grace, are quite certain never came out of it.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

TO JOHN BULL.
SIR—Since Beresford wrote his book, the miseries of London are so much increased, that his work is become incomplete. I, however, take the nuisances which have recently sprung up, more seriously than he took those which came under his observation, and my object in noticing them, is, to call the attention of the Legislature to the subject. The first I most particularly remark, is the establishment of what are called cheap coffee-houses, which appear to me, to be the most dangerous receptacles for all sorts of disreputable and disorderly persons; there is a sullen gloom about these places during the day, which indicates that night is the season for their orgies, and it will be nounce that the Examiner, the Times, the Black Dwarf, and other such works are taken in; it is known that the most hardened villains have been seen, and even apprehended in such retreats, and although I am not able to point out to the higher powers any mode of abolishing them altogether, I am quite sure that the man who contributes his mite to their extermination from amongst the metropolitan evils, will do a great piece of public service.

The second nuisance which I notice, is the innumerable host of caravans, which we find of late blocking up our streets - Edifices which the Crim Tartars would consider palaces, are to be found impeding our passage, and checking our career on every side; hore stands a temple on wheels, dedicated to a young lady who cuts out watch-papers with her nose; there a pile on springs devoted to an ingenious pig, who reads Greek almost as well as Dr. Parr; in front of us we see a towering edifice in which Mr. O'Shaughnessy O'Murrough O'Brien presents two yards and three quarters of humanity to the wondering crowd, and in our rear a smaller fane, in which Lady Morgan presents us with her squat body and double joints. These moveable buildings, stationed occasionally at the ends of streets leading into the Strand and at Charing Cross, collect round their enticing entrances, crowds, whose assemblage not only interrupts the progress of passengers, but greatly conduces to the success of pickpockets in their vocation.

A Third nuisance, is the intolerable insolence of hackney coachmen at night; these fellows having left their coaches at a considerable distance, ply for fares round the theatres, and other places of public resort, and then, secure that their numbers can never be discovered, enquire to what part of the town the plyce wishes to go? If it is perfectly agreeable to the coachman, the fare is accommodated, but if not, ridicule and abuse are the only returns one gets for threatening to punish this flagrant breach of duty, by which one is left to get cool and wet in the muddy purlieus of Drury Lane or Covent Garden. A remedy was proposed by a correspondent in the Morning Post, to which there does not appear to be any walfd objection, as far as I can see: this is, the enforcing the wearing of the numbers of the coaches in the hats, or on the sleeves of the drivers. I merely throw out these hints, that those who have the power of abating the nuisances by which the public are the sufferers, may pick I am, Sir, your's, WATCHMAN. them up if they please.

TO JOHN BULL.

DRAR MR. Bull.—Your readers may probably like the poetry of modern whigs, better than their politics, but as Mr. L's Catullus is not yet out, I must try their scholarship with the original.

• Ut flow in septis secretus nascitur hortis,

Multi illum pueri, multæ optavere puellæ ; Sic Virgo, dum intacta manet, dum cara suis est. At simul amisit polluto corpore florem, Nec pueris jucunda manet, nec cará puellis.

Pope, Mr. Bull, has imitated this passage (Dunciad IV. 409), and oddly enough, calls his frail flower Caroline, but must we not give him credit for a sort of poetical second sight, when he quotes for a precedent, an ambitious Hammersmith gardener, who put up such a frail flower for his sign, superscribing "This is MY QUEEN CAROLINE! Now for second sight in the critics:—Ritson, Mr. Bull,

Now for second sign in the critics—Mison, Mr. Bull, was a Radical, and his brother Radicals ought to assent to his definitions. The word "Waithman" says be, (See Robin Hood, vol 1. p. lxxv, note 1st edition, for in speaking of great things we ought to be accurate), the word "Waithman," seems equivalent to the English VAGABOND!—Yours, SCRUTATOR

TO JOHN BULL.

Sin,—A short time ago the University of Edinburgh voted a loyal Address to the Throne, replete with sound sense and proper feeling. Their example has been followed by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, but not without stremuous opposition from the whole phalanx of Kirh-radicals, who, forsooth, can see nothing in the aspect of the times that proclaims the prevalence of either irreligion or disaffection. In the opinion of Sir Harry Moncrief, it is a hisel on the people even to hint at the existence of these evils; and as to the kicentiousness of the press, Mr. Andrew Thompson declares that it is only to be found in the Journals hostile to the injured Queen.

I have a word or two to say to this reverend gentle-man, just to point out to him another quarter, in which the licentionsness of the press has been sufficiently conspicuous to attract a good deal of notice. He is himself Editor of a menthly work called The Christian Instructor, and little more than a twelvemonth has elapsed since Mr. Thompson, in this work, publicly libelled the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland as " silly and malignant drivellers—capable of any mischief and any injustice!" The reverend Member for the Presbytery of India drew the attention of the last General Assembly to e: and the Court, after unanimously declaring i to be highly injurious to the character of the Judicatories of the Established Church, did, by a majority of votes, consign over the work and its editor to the Procurator-the lawadviser and public prosecutor of the Church of Scotland!
At his mercy lies Mr. Andrew Thompson at this moment, liable to a prosecution for a libel on the whole body of his own brethren!! Yet this gentleman has the effrontery to speak of the licentiousness of the Ministerial Press! revenge for the notice with which he was benoured in the last Assembly, and for which lie was indebted to the Minister of St. Andrew's Church, Calcutta, he has occupied a considerable portion of the last July and August numbers of his Instructor, in the most virulent and libellous abuse of that gentleman, who, it is to be hoped, will make were present.

him as well acquainted with the Lord Advocate of the Crown, as the Assembly have with the Procurator of the Church

I am by no means astonished, that Mr. Andrew Thompson should object to an Address, in which it is made a subject of congratulation that the late combinations for the suppression of blasphemy and infidelity had been productive of good; for in one of the numbers of his Instructor, he sneeringly tells his readers, that these Associations are nothing more than pretexts for placing political abuses under the sanction of Christianity. His zeal for the injured Queen may be measured by the fol-lowing anecdote, which I pledge myself to be in every respect correctly stated.

On the accession of his present Majesty, Mr. Thomp son prayed for Queen Caroline by name; Lord Pit-milly, one of his Elders, left his church on this ac-count, and other respectable members threatened to follow his Lordship's example. Mr. Thompson hereupon desisted from any more notice of her Majesty in his public prayers; and when upbraided with this remissness in disprayers; and when upbraided with this remissness in discharge of what he must have conceived to be his duty, he solaced himself by declaring that he had done his duty—he had prayed twice, just by way of protest, to save the right! Yet this man is called pious! and when his brethren of the Presbytery unite to assure the Throne of their support, this man tells them, that if irreligion and disagnetic than the state of their support, the same tells them. fection be abroad, the fault must be their own; and advises them, instead of approaching the Crown with Addresses, to be more assiduous in discharging their clerical duties. While a prosecution for libel hangs over his own head, he denies that the Liberty of the Press has, in any instance, been so abused, as to require the notice of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, or any other public body desirous of curbing its licentiousness. This is really too much; and even outdoes in impudence any thing I have yet seen among the Lay-whigs of the North!—Yours, Edinburgh, 12th Jan. 1821. PETER MORRIS.

TO JOHN BULL.

SIR,—I shall feel obliged by your contradicting the statement made in your Paper of Sunday last, wherein you name a Mr. Haines as the author of "Montalto."

The Tragedy in question was committed to my care, to be presented to Drury-lane, under an injunction to keep the Author's name concealed; in consequence of which request it will not be made known to the public.

I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,
WILLIAM LINDSELL.

67, Wimpole-street, Jan. 17, 1821.

We insert this letter with great pleasure, and we are quite sure that the gentleman who writes it, will never divulge the sure that the gentleman who writes it, will never divulge the important secret which has been entrusted to him; but that is no reason why we should not repeat that the play was written by Mr. Haines. We said so at first because we believed it, and there is nothing in our correspondent's letter to shake our belief; on the contrary, if the Author is so very anxious to keep himself concealed, (and we confess we are not at all surprised that he is so) the very best thing he or his friends could have done, would have been to have allowed the blame to have rested quiefly upon poor Mr. Haines. There are we are quite convinced not five people in all the universe who care one straw about the thing, one way or the other; but, as our grounds for saying that Mr. Haines wrote the play were very good, we maintain them; and to satisfy our correspondent and his protess, we further say that it was not from him we obtained protegé, we further say that it was not from him we obtained the information.

THEATRE.

DRURY LANE. - We are glad to say that we are driven to violate our promise to ourselves not to meddle with Drury Lane: by the occurrence of an event, we confess, little looked for by us, we mean the production, at that theatre, of a performer likely to rank very high indeed in the musical depart-

A young lady, of the name of Wilson, made her appearance on Thursday in Mandane, in Artaxerxes: and, difficult as the character is to support with credit, we are pleased to say that she did more. Her performance, considered as a debut, was of the first order: her person fine and commanding; her voice strong and extensive; and her very timidity, natural to a beginner, rather added to than diminished the interest she excited.

Where she appeared to us to fail was in distinctness of execution; but, to those who know how very much the nerves have to do with this part of a vocalist's task, this wilt be no serious, objection; indeed, Miss Wilson has two or three tricks which we cannot presume to censure as habitual till we shall have seen her again, but we have no hesitation in saying that she is a great and powerful acquisition to the English opera. The 'soldier tired,' by dint of rattle, carried all before it; but where she seemed to us to descrive all the praise she received in the bravura, was in that sweet song—' If o'er the cruel tyrant love.' It is indeed hardly fair to judge of her by one night's exertion: she does infinite credit to her master, Mr. Welsh, who was, we understand, also Miss Stephens's master.

Madame Vestris made all she could of Artaxerxes; and Braham, as usual, received his full tribute of

The audience was numerous, but not particularly brilliant. Prince Leopold and some of the Whigs ORIGINAL POETRY.

THIS IMITATION OF BUNBURY'S LITTLE GREY MAN,

Preserved among the Tales of Wonder, is, without permission, inscribed to a Major-General of the British Army, Knight Commander of the Order of the Bath, Agent for the Ionian Islands, and a Pensioner of the present Administration. &c. &c. &c.

On! deep was the sorrow, and sad was the day, When death took our gracious old Monarch away, And gave us a Queen, lost to honour and fame, Whose manners are folly, whose conduct is shame; Who with aliens and vagabonds long having stroll'd, Soon caught up their morals, loose, brazen, and bold.

She had travers'd the globe in all quarters, to shew To what depth of debasement a Princess could go: And with front unabash'd, when her guilt was display'd, The alter insulted with implous parade; Whilst sick with disgust at a scene so profane, Not one decent female would move in her train.

She paid a vile rabble to shout round her car, Her teachers, so pious, were Fellowes and Parr; Her councillors, Aldermen Waithman and Wood, Could she find nothing worse? She might try if she could. Abroad there was nothing more low than her groom, At home there are Wilson, Moore, Hobbouse, and Hume.

Oh! what will the rancour of party not do! Ye Howards and Russells this sigh is for you! To an union so base can ye bend your proud will? Yes, great tho' the peril, unmeasur'd the ill, Through the country delusion and clamour must ring, And your rivals to strike, you must menace your King.

In Suffolk, to aid in so loyal a plan, From Mildenball upstarts a little dark man; His hue it was bilions, his eyes they were ghast, Long and pale were his fingers that held a quill fast, And grimly he scowl'd, whilst his rancour and spleen Distill'd in a spurious Address to the Queen.

How spotless and pure was this paragon shewn! How safe, thro' its friends, an attack on the Throne, Their motives were wicked, their actions were base ;-Some wonder'd no doubt at so alter'd a case, Who cannot forget, tho' 'tis plain that he can, The favours they heap'd on this dark little man.

From childhood the imp in the Palace was rear'd. It's bounties his parents, his kindred all shar'd; With rapid advancement, too rapid by half, He outstripp'd the foremost of line or of staff; But soon from the chances of service withdrew, With the profits and safety of office in view.

To Liverpool, Bathurst, and colleagues he bow'd; He courted their smiles, and attachment he vow'd; Obtain'd a snug place, with the means to do ill, To some who despis'd, but remember it still: He was feurlessly trusted, and laugh'd in his sleeve Those you mean to betray you must ever deceive.

Indulg'd by his patrons, the confident elf, No talent imagined except in himself; Of the merits of others a censor severe. Ev'n WELLINGTON might not escape from his speer; But they trusted him still, not suspecting his plan, Ah, little they knew of the dark little man!

Next a Gen'ral's apparel he put on, so new, The coat of fine scarlet, the facings of blue, With gold all embroider'd so costly; and last The loop with the plume that was digh in the blast, Twould have vex'd you at heart, if such sights ever can, To have gaz'd on the disen'd out littledark man.

That Order, of Heroes the dying bequest, Its ribbon that blush'd as if cover'd his breast; The Star and the Badge that try'd valour should wear, As if he had earn'd them, he took to his share Like a Pigmy he climb'd up on honour's high tree, And blazon'd his name with a large R. C. B.

Now the battle of battles was won! !- O'er his foce Triumphant the lion of England arose, And gave peace to the world .- No longer, 'twas plain, The little dark man could his office retain; Reluctant he went, but he pocketed clear, In pension and place fifteen hundred a year.

He growled and intrigued but in vain—he is gone! Soon forgotten by most, and regretted by none: But to sink in oblivion he cannot endure, The moment seems tempting, the victims seoure. Strike! strike at your friends! The foul blow it was sped, And with terrible justice recoil'd on his head.

The little dark man then he set up a yell, And the Hundred of Lack and was rous'd by the spell; He rais'd up his head, and he rais'd up his chin, And he grinn'd, and he shouted a horrible grin. And he laugh'd a faint laugh, and his cap up he cast; But pension and sinecure still be holds fast.

When a score and three days make the age of the year, To St. Stephen's, the Lords and the Commons repair: E'er a score and three more, so the King might decree The country another election may see. But the brave men of Suffolk have seen through his plan. And will buffle the arts of the little dark man.

THE BOOK OF WONDERS.

A work has been published under this title, containing, as the Editors inform us, "in eighty closely printed columns, a mass of information, more suited to the present moment, and better calculated to open the eyes of the people of England, than any work of a similar nature that has hitherto appeared;" it is moreover dedicated to the Queen, and illustrated with engravings.

The matter contained in this publication, would have been highly interesting, had not the character of Cobbett, of whom it treats, been completely established. His avowed and detected tergiversation losse us half the improvement the BOOK OF WONDERS would have afforded us, had there been a doubt left respecting him; even as it is, there is an infinity of amusement in looking at his inconsistencies, which are well arranged in the work for comparison; the book is quite worth having, and we will make a few extracts, which we think will justify us in giving it a good character.

Cobbett is made to start with these wholesome observations :---"Writing, particularly writing for the press, is a deliberate act. When a person sits down to write, his mind must be in some sort composed; time is necessary for the arrangement of his ideas; what he has written must be examined with care; he augments, curtails, corrects, and improves. All this naturally implies the most mature reflection, and makes an assertion

W. v. 2, p. 30.

"All serious Falseboods are criminal, and I, for my part, know of no other way than that of exposing and eensuring them." R. v. 18, p. 487.

After which sound remarks, we have, what are called Hor and Cold passages from his works; for example, of his offer to Government to give up his Register.

"Walter says, that I made a Proposition to the Government, that if I were not brought up for Judgment, I never would publish another Register or any other thing. The charge is basely false. No proposition of any sort was ever made by me, or by my authority, to the Government." v. 32, p. 12. [A. D. 1817]. Extract of a Letter from J. Reeves, Esq. to Mr. Cobbett.

I have your letter, with the inclosure. If the Government should feet themselves so circumstanced, that they car .ot hold their hand, but must direct the Attorney General to proceed, you will still have the benefit of your measure in the eyes of the court. No doubt, they will take such a sacrifice into consideration." Mr. Reeves to Mr. Cobbett. 27th June, 1810. [Clement's Trial].

Cobbett then says,

"As to the charge, that I opened a negociation with the Government, for making the dropping of the Register a condition upon which forgiveness was to be obtained; all that I can say is, that it is wholly destitute of truth; that it has been invented as much as any fairy tale ever was invented." v. 22, p. 93. (A. D. 1812.)

Then comes an extract from his letter to Mr. Reeves. "I never will again, upon any account, indite, publish, write, or contribute towards, any newspaper, or other publication of that nature, so long as I live."—Extract from the Offer its Government made by Cobbett, through John Reeves, esq. A. D. 1810. (Clement's Trial.)

OF THE QUEEN.

"The Queen ought to be informed that the very very few who dare to doubt of her innocence are compelled to hide their heads, and are hooted from all virtuous society." v. 36. p.

COLD. "A writer tells us, that the whole of the proof against the Princess amounts to some 'trifling levities,' and he adds, that from such levities' no woman in the land is free.' If by 'levities' be means any thing approaching to acts of gross familiarity with men, and if he means to say, that 'no woman in the land is free from such acts; then are the husbands and wives in this country, if they treat not the remark with indignation, well worthy of the contempt of the world." v. 10.

HOT. " An injured wife may be permitted to do many things not to be tolerated in a wife that has received no injury. I see no reason why a woman of thirty is to lock up her heart, to become a piece of wood or marble, merely because a busband's capricious inclination has rejected her." v. 37. p. 94.

COLD. "This writer reminds us of the unprotected, the helpless, situation of the Princess of Wales; and he seems to infer, that that situation, forms a tolerably good ground of excuse for 'trifling levities.' But if the situation has been what he describes it, ought it not rather to have produced an effect preto produce? What support, what comfort, has the Princess of Wales wanted? How long is it since her child ceased to reside under the same roof with her? How faw married women, comparatively speaking, have a mother to advise with! What need is there of advice with respect to a matter like that of which we are speaking? What ground of complaint is there, then, upon the score of being left destitute of friends and relations? In short, all these attempts to defend or excuse 'trifling levities' are so many assaults upon the morals of the nation." v. 10, p. 268.

OF WAITHMAN.

HOT. "Mr. Waithman is a man greatly gifted by nature. He has a mind clear and strong and ingenious. He is a man of great talents." v. 32. p. 1115.

Mr. Waithman is a man so sensible, so well informed, so clever, so sound, so clear-sighted, and so much above the trick-ery and fraud of faction." v. 13, p. 579.

"Mr. Waithman is a very sensible and a very worthy man."

v. 14, p. 108.

"Surely there never was so great a portion of folly, conceit, and impudence assembled before as Waithman posses es! Silent in the senate, and loud in the tovern! presumptuous, vain, empty; bis cormorant vanity seems ready to swallow up the very rattle of the hackney coaches. Any other man with his pretensions, and doing nothing at all, would have sneaked away into some eock-loff, and hange i himself in his French silk handkerehief. But he comes out as bold as brass; talks as loud, gapes as wide, and looks as impudent as ever; utters a long string of incoherent phrases; shakes his head, and then stares like a stuck-pig." v. 35, p. 376.

нот. "Mr. Waithman is possessed of far greater talents than nineteen-twentieths of the members of the Two Houses. Fete things would give me more pleasure then to see him in par-liament." v. 32, p. 826. Sept. 1817.

COLD. "The City-Cock Waithman is of no more use in the House of Commons, than a sucking baby would be. Fam glad this conceited brawler has been tried. He who is so great a man among the haberdashers, is nothing where wisdom and talent and courage are wanted. I predicted, that he would be of no use; for his incapacity was well known to me years ago." 35, pp. 25, 48. August 28, 1819.

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT.

HOT. "No man doubts the integrity of Sir F. Burdett any more than he doubts of his own existence." A. R. p. 738. [A. D.

COLD. "The word of Sir Francis Bardett is not worth a straw."

"Sir F. Burdett has never deviated from the path of political rectitude. Learned, eloquent, and sober, he is a most formidable foe to corruption. A. R. p. 657.—On his integrity, his courage, and his ability, we have all a firm reliance. v. 31, p. 179.—He has devoted his life to the liberties and happiness of his country." v. 31, p. 311.

COLD..
"To reason with such a man as Burdett would be absurd. He must be combated with weapons very different from a pen. We abhor the principles and conduct of the man: we detest and loath him: we would trample upon him for his false, base, and insolent assertions respecting our sovereign." v. 2, p. 84.

LORD CASTLEREAGH. "Lord Castlerengh is a nobleman whom no one can be sorry to see in office. His principles are sound; his character fair; his industry great, and order." v. 2, p. 18.

MR. BROUGHAM. his industry great; and his talents by no means of the inferior

"Mr. Brougham is an unprincipled brawler. v. 34, p. 324. Nature appears to have made him of materials which unfit him for being the counsellor of a high-minded woman." v. 36,

MR. TIERNEY.

"Tierney, who is a mere locuter of the duke of Bedford, has been, as it is called, upon the streets for more than fifteen years. There is no ministry to which he has not offered himself; but he never found admission into any one except for a very short time. There is hardly a corrupt trans-action to which he has not brought the support of his very great talents; but he is that sort of man, that all men, even the most corrupt, like best at a distance." A. R. 224. OF HIS SERENE ROYAL MIGHINESS THE PRINCE OF

COBOURG.

If the intended husband of the Princess Charlotte be a man of sense and spirit, he will soon find that his situation is not so very enviable, in spite of his 60,000l. a year; for though he may like a wife, he will hardly be able to endure with patience the sneers of the nobility and their sons, who will regard him as nothing more than a mere state hireling; a poor, mean fellow, who has concented to let himself out for the sake of a good living." A.R. p. 320.

"The Prince of Saxe Coburgh has had a tooth-ache, and, as you will be rejoiced to hear, the pain has been removed, but unfortunately, not without the pulling out of the tooth. The common talk in London, is, that it is the itch which be has; and that he stays at Brighton to get purified!"

"The marriage of the Princess Charlotte has been postponed a second time. Some say, that she declares she will not marry Mr. Coburgh. It is certain, that, if she has common sense, she will not marry him; for the moment she marries this man, the whole nation will despise her." A. R. p. 509.

ON SNUFF:
"How will any man dure to call himself a reformer who will not abstain from the use of that disgust-creating thing, will not abstain from the use of that disgust-creating thing, called Tohacco.—The French taught me the habit of taking Snuff, but it required only a very little effort to get rid of the filthy encumbrance." v. 35. p. 695. January, 1820!

"During the time of the Coventry election, one of the corners of my Snuff-nox, which stuck out beyond the bottom of my little finger, did good service—it cut the eyes and moses of the Savages at a famous rate." v. 36. p. 102. March, 1820!!

Remark by the same hand.

"A Lie that is bound down to dates is difficult to be successfully kept up." Corrective v. 5. p. 95.

We shall, if possible, continue these extracts occasionally, and have at the same time, no hesitation in recommending the work whence they are made.

'- MISCELLANEOUS.

Notice has been given to Sir F. Burdett to appear. and receive sentence next term .-- An arrest of judgment. is to be moved, and if that be unavailing, an appeal to the Lords.

A bill of indictment has been found by the Grand Jury for the city of London against Mr. Brown, the Keeper of Newgate, on a presentment made by the Grand Jury at the last Sessions, for refusing them admission to visit the gaol, and which they claimed to do as a matter of right. It is the intention, we understand, of Mr. Brown to remove the indictment, by certiorari, into his Majesty's Court of King's Bench to have the question fairly tried.

The newly-erected Church of St. Dunstan's in the East was opened for Divine Service on Sunday last, to a numerous congregation, when an excellent and appro-. priate discourse was delivered by the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Hesketh. The beauty and tasteful arrangement of the interior presents a fine specimen of English architecture, disencumbered of Gothic detail, and grotesque.ornaments .-- Mr. Laing is the architect.

The Pitt and Fox Clubs had festive meetings on the same day at Edinburgh, last week. The Marquis of Huntly presided at the former, and Lord Rosslyn at the latter. The Pitt dinner was attended by 700 persons of the first distinction. The Fox party by about 400.

Sir C. Greville and C. Mills, Esq. have declined to present to the Queen an Address of Congratulation, lately voted at Warwick. The former says, "I cannot approve of the Address itself, from a full conviction on my own mind, that it is both mistaken in point of facts, and unconstitutional in the principles it maintains." The latter also adds, "Having read the Resolutions, and the Addresses founded upon them, with all the care and attention which the subject of them demands, and finding that the sentiments and expressions contained: both in one and the other are in direct opposition to my own feelings and opinions, it is with the greatest re-luctance I feel myself compelled to decline presenting the Address."

Counsellor O'Connell has published a letter to the Irish Catholics, dissuading them from again petitioning an "un-reformed Parliament."

POLICE CHANGES .- A considerable alteration is about to be made in some of the Police establishments. The office in Shadwell is to be abolished, there being very little business transacted there. In several sessions there was only one commitment to Newgate from that office. This has arisen from the exertions of the Thames Police establishment, whose office is but a short distance from the Shadwell office. The business of that district will be transferred to the Thames Police. A Police Office is to be established for the accommodation of the northern. and north-west extremities of the metropolis, on the north-side of Mary-le-bone. Its district will include Paddington, the population of which has considerably increased of late years.

The Corporation of Ipswich have in their possession an. original letter, in the hand-writing of General Monk, the restorer of Charles II. and afterwards created Duke of Albemarle. It is dated on board the Resolution, Aug. 5,.. 1653, directing the Bailiffs to provide for the sick and wounded seamen in the fleet of the Commonwealth under his command, on their arrival at that port.

ST. ALBANS.—On Saturday, the poll finally closed at twelve o'clock, when the Mayor declared Sir Hen. Wright Wilson duly elected, the numbers being for Sir H. W. Wilson, 209—Charles Ross, Esq. 189.—John Easthope, · Esq. 177.—Sir Henry immediately came forward, and was loudly greeted by his friends. He addressed the electors, thanking them for the high honour they had conferred upon him, and assuring them that he should always be found at his post in Parliament, supporting his King and the Constitution of his country; and jocosely concluded by wishing that " the devil might fly away with him' if he abandoned either, or the local interests of his consti-

Mr. Ross and Mr. Easthope severally addressed the ople, and the usual ceremony of "chairing the Member" took place.

This event is highly satisfactory. Mr. Easthope, or as he has been called ever since he began his canvas, "Mr. Leasthope," is the first man who has started as a candidate for the representation of the people, as " A FRIEND to the Queen." Happely for the country the friends to the King and Constitution are rather the stronger party: and poor Nicholas Leasthope has been ousted most triumphantly. So far-so good.

On Sunday se'nnight, about 3 p. m. a singular phenomenon was observed at Mointrose, in the N.E. A snow-charged cloud assumed the appearance of the Aurora Borealis, with all the colours of the Iris, and continued "to start and shift," with great brilliancy, from N. to S. for upwards of half an hour, when the cloud was dissipated in a fall of snow and hall upon the earth.

Yesterday se'nnight the Leveret sloop of war. Captain Rodney Shandon, arrived at Portsmouth, from the St. Helena station, which she left on the 19th of November; last from Ascension on the 25th. The Vigo, Menai, Cygnet, and Shoerwater, were lying at St. Helena; the Brazen, at the Cape; Tees, at the Mauritius; Redwing, at Ascension. Buonaparte was in good health. His house was mished. The Leveret spoke the Maria, from Sierra Leone, bound to the River.

ARCTIC EXPEDITION .- Among the curiosities brought by the discovery ships is a whale's head brought from Melville Island, where it was found three quarters of a mile from the shore, and about 50 feet above the level of the sea, nearly embedded in the earth, where in all -probability it had lain for unany centuries. How it came into this situation is a problem not to be solved, except by the supposition, that these islands must formerly have been under the water; for its weight was so great, as to require seven men to move it down to the ship; and no human means existed in the quarter where it was discovered, to have transferred so ponderous a marine production to such a distance inland.—The head of the musk ox is a model of compact strength. The bases of the horns are so broad a to cover all the upper portion of the skull above the eyes, and several inches in thicknew, with slight grooves to the bend of the horn, when a smooth and line curve is projected. Of these animals, only three males were shot. When the spring had advanced a little, they appeared in small droves on Melville Island, coming evidently over the ice from the American continent. The females and the calves were very shy: but the superior boldness of the bull led him to face the human strangers till too late to retreat, and to this courage the three slain fell victims.—The carcase of the first killed, and largest weighed about 700lhs. or 570 without the entrails. They are, therefore, about the size of the cattle of the Scotch Highlands.—In ornithology the most beautiful specimen is the king duck, the pride of Arctic birds; the head is exquisitely marked, and the colours are equally superb and uncommon, the figures seem cut of the most elegant velvet, which the feathers resemble in form and substance. There is a skinny membrance above the bill, of a delicate lemon-tint, and all around is of hues as brilliant as faucy could conceive in a painted bird.—Of the mineral productions there are shows twenty different varieties, from granite and gneias, of the primitive, to sand-stone and iron stone of the secondary order. Several specimens of slate are among the number; a reddish granite like that of Egypt, mice, grey limestone, marble, serpentine, quartz, stinkstone, madrepores, and a sort of bituminous slaty coal, which burns with a flame like Cannel-coal when put to the

THE GREAT PEDESTRIAN MATCH COMPLETED .- Mr. Arnot, a Somersetshire Yeoman, it has been stated, started on the North Road on Wednesday last, to do two hundred and sixty-four miles in four days, which is far he-youd the compass of the powers of a horse. His first valage was to Dorchester, in Oxfordshire, from thence he took a North-eastward route to Nottingham, from thence to Donesster and back to Lincolnshire, where he com-pleted the extraordinary undertaking at eleven o'clock on Saturday night, although the weather was against him. The first day he completed 72 miles in 19 hours; second day, 69 miles in 20 hours; third day, 68 miles in 20 hours; fourth day, 55 miles in 21 hours; total, 264 miles.—The Pedestrian was much distressed on the out he took much time to do the last day's work. His blistered feet were relieved by worsted being drawn through the blisters, which was left in.

MR. KEAN .-- A Now York paper of the 6th ult. contains the following paragraph:

"Theatre.—Mr. Kean's second and best performance of Richard attracted again an overflowing audience. Public opinion, which was somewhat unsettled as to his merits, in consequence of the new style introduced, is perfectly reconciled to the simple, natural, and unostentations display of his genius. His strong points, the second night, were given with greater force, and the applause was more general and merited."

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

The Court were occupied on Tuesday and Wednezday with the trials of W. G. Wilmot, J. Want, Eliza Want his wife, and M. Butler; indicted for a conspiracy in charging Elizabeth Gaze (who had been servant to Wilmot) with a felony, (the prosecution against Mrs. Want and Miss Butler was abandoned). In the course of the inquiry it appeared that Wilmot, being a cheesenorger, had some disagreement with his servant, Gaze in consequence of not paying her the wages due to her—that she proceeded against him to recover the same in the Marshalsea Court, and that in consequence, he charged her with stenling some triling articles found in her boxes, and made good his charge at Marlborough-street Office, on which she was committed and subsequently acquitted. It was proved on the present trial that the character of the prosecurix was an excellent one, and that in fact, there were no real grounds for the charge of felony.

The Jury retired a short time, and found both the defendants

The Chairman and the Bench also retired, and at their return, sentenced Wilmot to 15 monds imprisonment, and Want to pay a fine of 2001, and to be imprisoned till the fine is paid.

SURREY SESSIONS.

On Wednesday Isnae Tapper, who had been a long time a Methodist preacher, and had a chapel of his own in Lock's-fields, was indicted for having received ten books and a table-cloth, knowing them to be stolen. The circumstances of the case were shortly these:—On the 14th of October last the bouse of Mrs. M. Schroder, a German lady, residing at Clapham, was robbed of considerable property, amongs which were in volumes of a German work, Martin Luther's Commentary on the Bible, and some table linen. One volume of the work in question was left behind by the thieves. On the the work in question was left beamed by the thieves. On the 4th of December the stolen work was offered for sale by the 4th of December, in company with a woman with whom he cohabited, to a Bookseller, in York-street, Covent-gurlen. The sum demanded by the prisoner for the work was 71. He said he find had it in his family for fifty years, but the account which he gave of the possession being disbelieved, he was taken into ae gave of the possession-being disbelieved, he was taken into custody, and at a the woman who went with him. The prisoner when he was taken into custody gave a false account of himself and refused at first to disclose his residence. An officer searched his residence in Temple-street and found there a table ctoth and harp cover, the property-of the prosecutrix.

The Jury found the prisoner (builty.

The Court, in passing seasence, observed, that they never saw a stronger instance of determined deprayity than the case of the prisoner at the bar, who had been before the Court no less than five times for helmous ofteness since 1813, and it was less than five times for beinous offences since 1813, and it was no later time July last since he was tried before the Court, when he was cauti ned end particularly admonished against continuing in his laiquitous course of life; but he had disregarded tose admonitions. He was, however, at last within the meshes of the law, and the Chairman regretted that in this case it did not go farther than it did, for excitinly the prisoner had been for years one of the most flagrant and successful receivers of stolen goods in the Borough of Southwark. The receivers of storm groups in the Driving of solutions. The turpitude of his course of life was particularly aggravated by his setting himself up as the promulgator of that law which said, "Thou shalt not steal," and "thou shalt not do any manner of injury to thy neighbour," and upon which they had now his practical comment. The Court seatened the prisoner to be imprisoned in the common gaci for a term of twen.y-four calendar months, the full punishment allowed by the law.

The prisoner begged leave, before he left them, to undecrive the Court. He had not be said, "bought" since he was cautioned by them in July last, but had sold "his business."

MANSION HOUSE .- On Monday, Mr. Duncan Campbell, who of Acts of Parliament, appeared against a Jew-boy, named Emanuel Allen, and charged him with robbing him of his

The evidence being of a direct and incontrovertible nature, the Chief Clerk drew up a recognizance in the usual manner, binding Mr. Campbell to appear at the Old Bailey, to prosecute and give evidence against the prisoner.

Mr. Campbell begged to know by what authority he was called upon to prosecute; he could not, in his opinion, be legally a prosecutor in a criminal case.

The Lord Mayor said, the Act of Parliament rendered it imperative upon the person robbed to prosecute the person against whom evidence could be adduced likely to lead to a conviction. In the event of refusal to enter into a recognizance to that effect, his Lordship apprehended the person robbed must himself go to prison, a place which he should be very corry to see his friend Mr. Campbell select.

Mr. Campbell believed there was no act which compelled a man to prosecute a thief. The King was the prosecutor, and he (Mr. Campbell) should not presume to take the responsibility out of such powerful hands.

The City Solicitar was sent-for, and upon being questioned by the Lord Mayor upon the liability of Mr. Campbell, in the event of his refusal to prosecute, that Gentleman said, without besitation, that a refusal must be followed by the consequences stated by the Lord Mayor, and hoped Mr. Campbell would adopt the alterentive. the alternative

A black, a native of Jamaica, apprentice to the Captain of a Jamaicaman, was on Thursday, brought before the Lord Mayor, Le having refused to return to Jamaica, lest he should again be made a slave.

The complainant stated, that the indenture was executed at The complainant stated, that the indenture was executed as Jannaica on the 3rd of Jane, 1820. He purchased the defendant from Captain H. and appointed him to the situation of his attendant, after which he took him as an apprentice. His term was to expire at the close of five years. The black was placed by him in an Inspirat in London, and he expected that the moment his apprentice was recovered he would return to his duty. The black instant of delivered deceaned.

The black, instead of doing so, decamped.

The black declared to the Lord Mayor that be had never heen manunitted. He had, it was true, signed a paper, but he knew nothing of its contents, previous to his leaving Jamaica. He was a slave when he did so, and of course was as much incapacitated from entering into a contract as a horse, with whose labours he had, in a state of servetude, daily to contend. He admirted that his longings for liberty were such as to induce him to make many sacrifices to obt: in such a blessing.

After some discussion, the black was sent to the Compter, where he is to remain a few days, when Mr. Williams, the Sheriff, will exert himself for the poor fellow's advantage.

REACUR GAWO.—Yesterday se'nnight, J. Stanley, alias Jack Jolly; M. Herd; W. Watts; J. Harris, & G. Harris, nlias Keylocks; R. M'Bride; W. Jones, and W. Hardy, were convicted for rescuing S. Jones. W. On Monday, Margaret Warren, an Irishwoman, was indicted for stealing two knuckles of bacon, the property of John Haw ley. The prosecutor is a cheesemonger, and proved that the

The provenuor being asked whether he saw the witness in his shop, said he had never seen him in his life.

The Recorder told the Irishman that nobody would believe

The Irishman said he came there to speak the truth, and nothing but the truth.

The Recorder .- If you don't go about your business, I'll have you prosecuted for perjury.

MISCELLANEOUS.

VIERNA, Jan. 1.—The Emperor, the Empress, the Archdukes Charles and John, the Archduchesses Charles and Mary, and the Princess of Salerno, met on the 30th ult. at eleven in the morning, at the Imperial Palace, where they received the Emperor Alexander, who was conducted to the apartments allotted for him. In the afternoon the Russian Monarch paid visits to the above personness. On the 3rd inst. the Emperor Alexander will leave this place for Laybach.

A transit of Mercury will take place at six o'clock in the morning of the 3d of February, when that planet will appear like a round black spot on the face of the sun.

BANK NOTES.—It is mentioned that the new Bank Notes will not be ready for issuing before April next. There are two millions of different notes of various amounts ready, with the exception of the numbers and dates; and as the machinery, it is said, was rather too sharp for numbering the notes without injuring them, it has been so improved, as to prevent a recurrence of the inconvenience. A steam engine of great power is constantly at work for the manufacture of these notes.

It was evidently drawn up with no other view but to be printed at a future period, for in the very first dozen lines the Attorney-General was attacked, as if personally present, it having been, no doubt, expected he would conduct the prosecution. That Gentleman, however, was not in Court, being detained elsewhere. The defence then proceeded to justify the libel, by a tissue of wretched assertions, founded on false doctrines, and supported by inapplicable quotations from the ancient philosophers, and from Scripture.

The Lord Chief Justice asked the defendant whether she had any witnesses. She replied in the negative.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

. BERESHIRE.—A severe conflict took place a few nights since, between a gang of five posshers and the keepers of Windsor Great Park. The keepers were apprised of the presence of the ponchers by repeated reports of guns discharged in the several plantations at the pheasants on the trees, as early as eleven o'clock, but it was not till twelve o'clock that the action commenced, when the poschers had taken a position on a bridge, four a-breast, with presented arms, threatening to fire if the keepers advanced a step further. The keepers answered "We have arms, and are determined to take you;" advancing at the same time. The determined to take you; "advancing at the same time. The possibers immediately fired: a close action then commenced with the butt-ends of their plees, which terminated in the surrender of three of the possibers, who are lodged in Windsor gall: their names are Martin Killock, Thomas Neighbour, and Joseph Chase. They are dreadfully beaten and braised. The four keepers and three of their men received many severe blows: one of them, Page, lies so ill of three wounds in his head as not to be able to attend publicly to give evidence. Upon examining the spot where the contest took place, four grups were found: one of them broken in three piaces, two of guns were found; one of them broken in three pieces, two of them loaded with powder and small shet, and one that appeared to have been not long discharged. Nine pheasants were found

Buny. - On Saturday week, about dusk, as Mr. Samuel Wood, a young man about 18 years of age, the son of Mr. Wood, of the White Lion, in this Town, was returning home from Manchester market, he was attacked near the Ostrich, in Rooden-lane, by a footpad, who laid hold of him, unperdrew forth a moderate sized horse-pistol, and with dreadful threats said, "if he moved he would blow his brains out." The young man then seized upon the pistol by the upper part of the barrel, and the fellow fired at him: the shot, apparently slugs, happily passed through his great cont, without occasioning any other injury to him. A scuffle now ensued, each of them grasping the pistol, and the result of the conflict was for some time doubtful, till at length the villain ran away, retreating into a small pursery leading to the Earl of Wilton's, and from thence precipitately decamped down a narrow lane, and made his

EXETER .- On Sunday last, as the Minister of St. Giles's, EXETER.—On Sunday last, as the Minister of St. Glies's, near Torrington, was joining a young couple in Hymen's bands, two rude fellows entered the charch just as he said, "What God joineth together, let no man put assunder," and seized the bridegroom by the collar. The clergyman, not a little surprised at their presumption in stopping him in so importage a part of his duty, was beginning to expostulate, when they declared themselves constables tent with a warrunt to apprehend Cock, the intended bridegroom, he being a runaway apprentice; they took him bathed in tears from the sacred altar, and lodged him in a prison, leaving the disappointed bride to reflect on the old adage, "There is many a slip be-bride to reflect on the old adage, "Incre is many a sup untween the cap and the lip."

LEDB.—Murder.—On Friday, the 5th instant, a murder was committed at Whitehouses, about two miles from Pateley-bridge, near Ripon, attended with circumstances of particles. atrocity. Ibbetson Mason, was a respectable butcher at Whitehouses, who had been employed in dressing a sheep for the market; in which employment he had been essisted by a younger brother. What occurred between them on this occa-sion is unknown; but the mother of the young man, having occasion shortly afterwards to go into the shop, was apalled with the dreadful spectacle of her eldest son lying dead upon with the dreadful spectacle of her eldest son lying dead upon the floor, and weltering in his blood. His scull was dreadfully fractured, and the brains were literally scattered in various directions upon the floor. An axe, besmeared with blood, was found near the body. Suspicion instantly fell upon his brother, Joseph Mason, who had quitted the shop only a short time before his mother entered it, and who, it seems, had previously expressed a wish or intention to murder his brother. Upon in expressed a wish or intention to murder his brother. Upon inquiry it was ascertained that he had gone to Knaresborough for the alleged purpose of visiting his other brother. A Constable was immediately dispatched after him; he was apprehended at Knaresbrough; and, upon searching him, a large butcher's knife was found concealed upon his person, with which, it was supposed, he intended to murder his younger brother. An Inquest was held upon the body, when, after a long investigation into all the circumstances, the Jury returned a verdict of—"Wilful Murder against Joseph Mason,"—who was committed to York Castle to take his trial. to York Castle to take his trial.

TEWKESBURY .- A few days since, as the Hero Bristol and TEWKERBURY.—A few days since, as the Hero Disson and Birmingham coach was passing along the causeway, leading from the bridge, on the Worcester-road, it was met at the toll-gate by another Bristol coach, when the coachmen, having some business to transact with each other, got down and left their horses, when, on a sudden, the horses of the Hero coach, turned round and went back to the town in full speed. Some persons attempted to stop them; but their exertions only alarmed the horses more, and turning short round, the leaders jumped over the battlement of the bridge, where they remained sus-pended by the harness until assistance was procured, and they were extricated from their perilous situation. There were but two passengers with the coach, (one of whom was Captain Willis of this town), and their feelings cannot easily be described, for they may be said to have been miraculously pre-

ACCIDENTS. OFFENCES, &c.

On Saturday morning, the family of Mr. Farmer, a cheesemonger of High-street, Shadwell, were thrown into alarm at hearing a noise, as if occasioned by robbers endeavouring to gain admission. A person gave the alarm at the two adjoining houses, occupied by Mr. Rochester, a tea-dealer, and Mr. ing houses, occupied by Mr. Rochester, a tea-dealer, and Mr. Spring, a ship-bottoming warehouse, who also got up to oppose the entrance of the supposed robber; but that supposition was soon abolished, as the whole of the roofs of the three houses at the same time, and with a tremendous crush, fell in, and bore down the third floor of each house, and materially injured the second. Two children, who were asleep in a room on the second floor of Mr. Farmer's house, narrowly escaped being killed, as one of the rafters fell through the foot of the head in which they slout. bed in which they slept.

EXTRAORDINARY ESCAPR.—Early on the morning of Tuesday week, some men belonging to Sheriff-hill Colliery, Northumberland, were waiting the arrival of the gin-horse to go down into the pit. Owing to the cleaning of the boiler, the regular engine rope was not in a working state at the moment; but about 20 fathoms of it, with the chain, were hanging into the shaft. One of the men, John Wilson, having, in the dark, gone incautionsly too near the bridge, fell in. Repeated cries from within the shaft at last roused the attention of the other men, who, on repairing to the spot with a light, were told by him that he had fallen into the pit, and was then hanging by the rope. As s. on as the alarm would allow them to take measures for his preservation, they proceeded to adjust the ginrope. After fixing on a corf, one of them wished to descend in it to his assistance, but this Wilson forbade them to do. The corf was now let down gently till it came under his feet; he then freed himself from the engine rope, and being seated in the corf, was drawn slowly to the bank, in a state of independent the corf, was drawn slowly to the bank, in a state of independent the corf, was drawn slowly to the bank, in a state of independent of the cort was the state of the cort was how the cort was how with the seciety of the cort was the cort was how to the bank, in a state of independent of the cort was in the corf, was drawn slowly to the bank, in a state of inde-scribable trepidation. He was, however, able, with the assist-ance of another man, to walk upwards of a mile to his own bouse, which on entering, he threw himself upon his knees, and poured out his fervont thanks to God for his deliverance.

HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—A few nights since, between seven and eight o'clock, as Thomas Jefferson, a skop-keeper, of Market-street, was coming to London, he was stopped on the other side of Barnet, by a single highwayman well mounted, who robbed him of 151, in notes and some silver, but he did not take highwayman. He then gallocal of his watch. He then galloped off.

SMITHFIELD, Jan. 23.

We had but little variation this day in our Markets. With respect to Meat, the demand was not very great; the supply, of course, was not very large. In Beef and Mutton prices were merely nominal. Hay and Straw were rather stationary.

STOCKS, MONDAY, Jan. 29.

Consols opened this morning at 72, and quickly reached 784; at 12 o'clock a rumour pervaded the Stock Exchange, that an express had reached a Jew house, bringing intelligence of an unfavomble nature from the Continent, which had an immediate effection the Finds; by the extensive sales which were effected owing to the above circumstance. Careele chartly effected owing to the above circumstance, Consols shortly afterwards fell to 71½, at which price they were at 12 o'clock, and for the Account at 71½.

We are greatly obliged to J. U. G. P. for his kind communication; he will see that we have attended to his favour, and shall on all occasions gladly receive any hints which he may honour us with in respect to the City.

Bill was send a first time. The Beel of Belimore rose to propose the Address. The Noble Earl observed, that few remarks were required on his part, when all were anxious to approach His Majesty with sentiments of numbers loyalty, and a firm determination to main-tain the Constitution, and to support the dignity of the Throne, on which depended the existence of the liberties which the country enjoyed. In the midst of the distresses and difficulties which pressed so heavily upon the people, he had most deploted the existence of a spirit which endeavoured to turn those distresses to its own account, and to orerthrow every established institution of the country.—(Hear, hear!)—If that spirit had raged for a since, how great must be the satisfaction of their Lordships when they saw feelings of loyalty revive, uninfluence by molives of interest or party, but speaking the manly sentiments of the country.—(*less, *ess.')—The Noble Earl then noticed the principal topics in the Speech, siz. the friendty dispusitions of the Allied Peacers—the proposed reduction in the military establishment—the considerable improvement in the several branches of our commerce and manufactures; all which are sources of congratulation. He then noticed the defiwhich are sources of congratulation. He then noticed the defi-ciency in the Irich revenue. The distresses experienced by the Irish prospie were of a nature peculiarly severe. The failure of the Banks, which supplied the country with paper currency, had withdrawn, he a moment, nearly the whole of its circula-tion. But if the distress had been great, he trusted he should be allowed to express ids admiration of the paience and forti-tude with which it hard been borne.— (Figs., hear, hear!)—On the next of Comments to the contract of the paience and fortithe part of Government every effort had been made to alleviate that distress; and he could take upon himself to declare, that at no period of her history had Ireland been more scalously loyal and affectionate to her King than at the present. The was an echo of the sentiments contained in the Speech.) Lord Prudhee seconded the Address, and urged similar rea-sons for producing that unanimity which he had no doubt the House and the country would feel from the general tenor of his Noble Earl concluded with moving an Address (which, as usual,

Majerty's Speech. Borl Grey congratulated the House, that though these might be persons who washed to spread agitation and discontent, yet no individual, either in this or the other House of Parliament, felt any other sentiment than that of the most leyal, dutiful, and affectionate attachment to the person and Government of His Majesty.—(Elearyteen?)—the had never witnessed a more clear and manifest expression of public opinion in that respect than what had lately taken place. At the same time, he must contend, that the pinion conveyed a disapprobation of the measures of Ministers. He regrated, therefore, that he did not see in the Summit structures of a intention, o her did not see in the Speech any symptom of an intention to aban-don the present system of Government, which, if not given up, or materially altered, would involve the country in confusion and ruin. With respect to the hoprovement in the Revenue, at admitted that the receipts had increased, but not to the extons stated. He regretted that so notice had been taken of the agricultural interests in the Speach, which had suffered muterially, and which must consequently affect the resease. It was necessary, therefore, in point of policy, that something was necessary, therefore, in point of policy, that something should be done for the farmer. The Noble Earl next advanted to the situation in which the country stood with respect to Foreign Fowers. He rejoiced that thuse Powers gave amerates of their friendly supposition—a friendship which he heoped Ministers would cultivate. There was not, however, any thing distinct in the Speech on the subject of Italy; and he regretted that no decisive step had been taken to prevent the taken of the ground bis constitute. He should be a like that the subject of the second bis constitute. fraction of the general transmillity. He thought it an alarm-ing circumstance, that we had no accredited Minister at the Count of Naples, white such deliberations were going on at Troppes and Laybach. He expressed his indignation that the Allies should have summoned the King of Naples before them for the high crime of endeavouring, or enther sanctioning the abuses in his country. He should have been better satisfied if the Speech had contained ag awarance that this country would not sanction the power which this self-constituted Tribunal had assumed. On the contrary, it would appear, by a Britis squadron cruixing in the Bayrof Naples, and England lent its sanction to the march of the Austrians towards the frontiers of Italy. In conclusion, the Noble Earl expressed his satisfaction at the proposed reduction in our Military Establishment, which he hoped would be considerable, as it would not only relieve the distresses of the people, but allay whatever discontents might exist. With suspect to the Queen, he hoped her esta-blishment would be such as to put an end to all-causes for disagreement and agitation. The Barl of Liverpool replied to the observations of the Noble East (in alluding to separate Noble Mover of the Address had stated respecting the sentiments of logalty expressed in the late Addresses to the Throne,) who had contended that the universal opinion of the country was against the system of Government pursued by His Majesty's Ministers. He had not, however, explained what he menat by their system of Government. Did he mean the whole, or particular measucer?—He (Lord L.) agreed that on subjects of this nature a distinction ought to be made between hysalty to the Thrane and disapprobation of the measures of Government; and that the vices and errors of the latter, if vices and errors existed ought not to be visited on the Crown. But if the Noble Earl expected that His Majesty's servants were prepared to propose any change in their system of Government, he was greatly mistaken; for it was their opinion, as it was that of the majority of the nation, that to the system which they had adopted, the country owel its rescue from ruin.—(Hear, hear!)—If it were changed it must be by other councils and other views. He assured the Noble Karl that there was no disposition on the part of Ministers to blink the situation of the country was multing oner stated in the Speech, nothing omitted, for, he woods find that though the subject of agriculture was not named it was included in the last participable, which noticed the dischess which the Mujasty's adojets fell the pressure of. Twolve months since the great persone by on the manufacturing interest; that branch had since improved, and, so the other head, the reseases had follow much assistance. the pressure had fallen upon agriculture. Some years ago, a remedy had been applied against foreign importation, which was then considered to be the cause of the distress experienced by farmens. It was now found, however, the priors had falled nearly as low as before that remedy had loop provided. To what, therefore, could the evil be ascribed, but to an increase of production in the country?—(Hear, hear!)—For two years there had been no impostation of fuseign corn.—(Hear, hear!) Me knew that it was supposed, that under the Warehousing shot, the corn hept in warehouses might find its way into the country for home conquestion. But the subject had been and might still further his investigated and the supposed. and might still further be investigated, and the supposed and might still further be investigated, and the supposed introduction of seen was found to be totally imprecionable. If it was impracticable, no other sensition would be adopted, than that the present low prices of grain were occasioned by inocease of production in the country. He was not sorry to throw this at present for future distantion, if any Mahly Lord should be disposed to enter into the subject. But let not the House go into the discussion with any idea that relief could be procured by legislating upon the subject. The Noble Earl then proceeded to notice the remarks made upon our relations with Farsign Powers. The expression in the Speech—(which he housed would be satisfactory to the country.) viz. : —(which he hoped would be satisfactory to the country,) vis.:

"that it would be a matter of deep regret to him, if the occurronous which had lately taken place in Italy, should eventually lead to any interruption of tranquility in that quarter; but that it would, in such case, he his great object to secure to his people the continuance of peace." Whether or not war ensued on the Continent, the system of this country was taken. Then system was one of pence.—(Hear, hear!)—It appeared to him that the Noble Earl wished that England should have adopted certain measures to prevent the Allies from easying their plan into execution. But until be knew all the circus stances of the case, no one could be able to decis of policy it would have been failing for His Majesty's Government to embrace. With regard to revolutions abroad, or in ment to embrace. With regard to revolutions across, or me this country, he did not wish to shrink from expressing his opinion. He was not one of those who approved of all revolutions because they were revolutions. On the other hand, he was not one of those who could not distinguish between a revolution against a good King and one against a tyrant. He thought that to abstain from interfering, was the best line of policy which this country could adopt, because, if it embraced the policy of interference, it might give a judgment without pos-seating the meesury means of forming a right one. This was the system on which His Majosty's Ministers and acted. No measure had been taken by this country, but in the true spirit of neutrality, and not only to world interference, but even any aitmation which might there led to it. With respect to the Military Retablishment a very considerable reduction would be made. And he had the further gratification to declare his firm belief, that the expenses of the year would be provided for without the necessity of creating any additional stock—(Mah), hear.)—On the subject of closing the last Session abruptly; it was not out of disrespect to Parliament, but to suit the convenience of the Members by not detaining them in town, when the expression of the Royal thanks might be mossfully convexed legenflor. He had thus briefly relied to the alleso of the Noble Earl, and had, at least, the satisfaction to know that neither in His Majery's Speech, nor in the Address proposed, that Noble Earl had been able to find any thing against which he might direct a sproific objection.

Lend Holland toso principally to just some questions to like Noble Earl (Liverpool.) He understood from the correspondence with the Newpolium Government, that on the 12th Juny, 1815, a Tearly had been signed between the Emperor of Australia. tria and the King of Naples, in which, by a secret article, the King engaged himself neither to alter his institutions, mor to make any new ones subversive of the principle of Monerchy, or contrary to the spaters of Government, which this imperial Majesty had always pursued in his Italian States. If Ministens know nothing of that anticle, how came their Atlies to Impose knew nothing of that article, how eams their Allies to impose such conditions without their knowledge? Under such circumstances, why should they not any to Austria, "It appears you are very flush of each; you intend to give great intenest to English Gentlemen for their money, to nothe a crusade in the South of Luly; but stop, we have a writ against you. Have the guodness to pay urbufore you precent to relieve the people of Naples from the horsors of a free Government; pay your debts first."—And what was the amount of that debt?—Not less than 15 or 16 millions. He concluded by putting the lawing questions to the Noble Earl (Liverpool):—Machine Gentleman may residing at Naples, was the accordated from this country to the Neapolitan Court? Whether he had been instructed to give assurances to the people of Naples while any thing they might the to improve their institutes and the meet with our support? Whether the savet article of the result between Austria and Naples, in 1815, had been coopmunicated to His Majesty's Government? And whether any numbated to His Majesty's Government? and whether any application had been made to dustria for the payment of the loss and interest due to this source, and what answer had been required?

The Bart of Liverpool said, that on the exercise of Rughe and the Poreign Powers he had already stated the genera-views entertained by His Marjesty's Government. If the Noble vious enferinised by His Majesty's Government. If the Noble Baron would bring aby of his questions is the shape of a mo-tion at a proper time, he would have no objection to produce

The Lords met at one o'clock, for the purpose of going to Carlton Palace with the Address.

The Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Edmore, Lord Predice, the Earl of Livespool, and second other Lords, formed the cavalcade, which arrived at Carlton-House about two o'clock. After the presentation of the Address, the Lord Chancellor returned to the House, but no business was done. The other Lords did not return, and at four o'clock the Lord Chancellor adjourned

THURSDAY.

The Lord Chancelter informed the House that His Majesty had been waited up with the Address, to which a guerious Asswer had been returned. The Answer was ordered to be extered on the Journals.

A great number of potitions were presented, (praying, in general, that the Queen might be restored to her legal and Con-Aftutional rights,) from Banff, Dumfries, Montrose, Selkirk, therdeen, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons, of the City of London, which were laid on the table.

On presenting a petition to the same effect, from the Freeholders of the County of Kent by the Earl of Darmley, the Noble Earl complained of the conduct of the Sheriff, in medising to pay any attention to the requisition for calling a meeting, though signed by himself, a Noble Friend near him, and two hundred freeholders. He conceived it to be highly needssay to consider how far a Sheriff was authorized in refusing to comply with a requisition coming from a large and respectable body of freeholders, upon a question of great national importance. Indeed, it was a subject well worthy the Attention of Parliament; for if the Executive Government should select none but its own adherents to be Sheriffs of Counties, and if such persons conceived themselves bound to act up to the wishes of their employers, the Counties of the Kingdom might at list be prevented from assembling in a legal and con-stitutional manner, and be thus deprived of all means of expres-sing their soutiments on great public questions.

The Earl of Licerpool could declare, upon his honour, that no appointments were more regular and constitutional than Skose of the Sheriffs of Counties—they were appointments skrictly judicies. Three persons were first minded by the advice of the Judges; and then one of these was selected by the Eving in Council; and he assured the Noble Lord that, in such stelection there was no kind of partiality, nor any reference to the political opinions which the individual chosen might be supseri treaterists.

Earl Gressenor observed, that the shuse alluded to had equ curred also in Cheshire, and had been carried to a most dangercous extent, not only in the refusal on the part of these oftheir illegal and unwarrantable conduct at Public Medrings, after the same were called. Politions were then presented from Wills, Devices, Perth, St. Saviour's, Southwark, &c. These petitions were similar in offect to the proceding ones.

Lord Eliciberough observed that all these polition dered the Queon to have been deprived of her rights and privileges, which was not the fact.

The Bark of Cataorton presented a partition from the Free-holders of the County of Hants. On this occasion be thought it necessary to take notice of an attempt that had been which by several persons of high rank in the County, to pre-rent this Meeting from being assembled. These persons, arrong whent was a Nebbe Duke whem he saw in his place, stated as the grounds for objecting to this Meeting, that the as the grounds for objecting to this Meeting, that the antied as the grounds for objecting to this Meeting, that the same of the Frebolders had already been taken in a Loyal Address to the King, which had be'n signed by a numerous body of Presholders: and on that ground they declared their epision that it would be impresent to smemble the County.

The Duke of Wellington said, that as Lord Lieutenant of the County of Hants, he had conceived that it was not right that those who had previously said; aloyal address to His Manager and the County of Hants and the same of the Manager and the Manag jessy, an address that had hown signed by 0,000 porants, should seartion the meeting that was afterwards sailed by the High Sheriff. After the sense of the freeholders had already been taken, and when he knew is what manner the meeting called tracer, and when he knew in what manner the intering carried by the Slicitiff was conducted, be could not consider it in any other light that that of a more farce.—(Loud crite of Mear, deer!) At that meeting the Members for the county were present, and one of them was treated in such a manner as to feel it necessary to be protected by the Nobie Lord.

The East of Carnerson rose, and is an impassioned tone of voice declared that it was with astonishment and disnay be voice doclared that it was with actonishment and dismay be heard the Noble Duke, who held so high a situation in His Majesty's Councils, and who hore to high a character in the country, any that if meeting regularly convened by the Sheriff of a County wis seniore force. If such a sestiment as this wins to be allowed to go forth from high authority, it would some follow that the people out of doors would be inclined to say, that the proceedings of that House were nothing more than a

The Marquis of Lanadowner fully agreed with every thing which had been said by his Noble Friend on this subject.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Borl Greg said, a declaration had appeared in the public ints as having emanated from the Allied Sovereigns, and high had been said before the Senate of Hamburgh, the contributing parageorph being: — "As the existent to he foliawed has no other foundation than Treatism already existing, they have no doubt of the assent of the Courts of Peris and Lordon. The only object of this system is to consolidate the Alliance between the Sovereigns; it has no view to conquest, or to violations of the independence of other Powers. Voluntarily ameliorations in the Government will not be impeded. They desire only to maintain tranquility, and prevent Europe from the security of new Revolutions, to protect them as far as prassible."—He wished to know if a copy of this declaration bad been sent to this constry; and was there any foundation for the assumption that England would concur to the extent to which it was here represented that England was obliged by

The Rarl of Liesenned said, he had not the least difficulty in giving the Noble Lord every explanation that was in his power to make. With respect to the Declaration read by the Noble Earl, he had no difficulty in stating, that it was an incorrect copy of a Poper which did exist. In the first place, he could must that there was no treaty in emistence of the nature alleded to by the Noble Barl, as actived in this document. In the next place, he would assure the House, that the Court of London was no party to the proceedings at Troppau, or at Laybach. He would add, that in consequence of a communication from e Allied Sovereigns at Troppan, a Paper was sent from this country, explaining fully and unequivocally the line of policy which this country had decided upon adopting. This Paper he rould lay before the House almost immediately. He had rather that it was not moved for that night; not that he had any difficulty in producing it, but he was inclined to doubt that this mode of producing it was the most regular.

Earl Grey said, that the answer of the Noble Earl was perfectly satisfactory.—Adjourned till Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

At twenty minutes before two o'clock the Speaker catered the House, in the presence of upwards of a hundred Members, and shortly afterwards took the Chair. The Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod appeared at the Bar, and ausmoned the House to the House of Peers, to hear the Royal Speech delivered from the Throne. The Speaker then left the House, attended by a large number of the Members present. THE QUEEN.-THE LITURGY.

THE QUEEN.—THE LITURGY.

Some conversation arose is consequence of Lord A. Hamilton's giving notice of a Motion for Friday for the insertion of the Queen's name is the Liturgy. Mr. Wethereft intimating his intention to move for certain papers connected with that motion, Mr. Hume urged Mr. W. to move instanter, accordingly Mr. Wetherell moves for "Copies of all the authentic documents of all Collects and Litanies in the public Liturgy of the Church, from the reign of James II. to the present time, is which the names of Queen Consorty have been inserted and for all Collects and Litanies in the statutes of quiferand for all Collects and Litanies in the statutes of unifor-mity by which the names of the Kings and Queens have been inserted, and blanks filled up. Also for a copy of the Order in Council of the 12th January, 1820, by which her Majesty's name was omitted in the Liturgy," is order to put the House in possession of facts connected with her Ma-

Lord Castlereagh may no reason for the production of these papers. If the Hon. Gent. supposed that there was any reluctance on the part of his Majesty's Government to produce these papers, he estimated their intentions most erroneously. But the suddenness and extraordinary nature of the motion left him in doubt, even as to the particular office at which the documents might be found. With respect to the notice of motion, he would put it to the House, whether the Constitution under which we lived, was likely to be benefited by recent specimens of reformation in Parliament? (Cheers from the Opposition benches.) He regretted that the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Vierney) did not exercise his influence on that side of the House with more effect. The Noble Lord had no idea where the papers were to be found; and, if the motion was persisted in, he must meet it by the previous question

Mr. Tiwney urged the necessity of producing the papers in order to come to a decision properly on the motion of the Noble Lord on Friday.

Some further discussion arose, in which Mr. Bragge Ba-Some further discussion across, in which sar, Bragge sa-thurst, Mr. Hume, Lord Millon, Sir J. Mackintosh, Mr. Scar-lett, Mr. Serjeant Onslow, and the Chanceltor of the Exche-quer took part, and then the House divided—For the previous question 708, against it 169, majority 37.

After the division, (before the gallery was opened,) Lord Costlereagh said, that he did not object to giving the information, but that he objected to the motion, without notice, as unprecedented,
THE KING'S SPEECH.

The Speaker then acquainted the House that he had been ords and board his Majesty'sspeech, which w read, (for which, see the Lords.)

Mr. Banker, Jun. rose to propose the Address. The Hon. Gent. dwelt on the fidelity and loyelty of the nation, which, he succeed, not withstanding the mischievous attempts made to subvert that loyalty, was sound at heart. He then described the attempts made to destroy the constitution, and acribed the attempts made to destroy the constitution, and enforced, in energetic language, the necessity for repelling the general develling system which was directed against the well affected. He rejoiced in the calm serenity which was apparent abroad; at our flag flying in every sees, our busy injustry plying in every port; our character every where standing high, and our credit every where firm. Having descented at some length on these cheering prospects, he concluded with moving the Address.

Mr. Recommended the motion, and went over nearly the

Mr. Brown seconded the motion, and went over nearly the sanie grounds.

Mr. Cursen contended that Ministers' possessed but little knowledge of the state of the country; yet, he was ready to admit that his Majesty's Speech offered but little for ani-madversion. He regretted that the state of our agricultural interests should have been smitted, which were in great distrem: still he was happy to see a conciliatory disposition on the part of the Ministers. It was impossible the country could go on paying the heavy taxes at present imposed, he, therefore, recommended a reduction in the whole of our expenditure, capable of being reduced, as a corrective for for the evil.

Mr. Tierney admitted that the Speech was in general very satisfactory, yet some of the topics required ob-servations. He (Mr. T.) received with great satisfaction his Majesty's assurance that Foreign Powers continued to optertain friendly dispositions towards this country'; and notwithstanding the state of Italy, adverted to in the Speech, he was so firmly persuaded that the stability and security of the country depended upon the continuance of peace, that he shoul look forward to that period which should again plunge this country late war with great dismay. Ministers, he thought, could not do their dufy if they did not interfere to prevent the aggression of any great power against a smaller one. He observed with pleasure that a reduction was intended in the Military Expenditure, but he regretted the defusion held out in respect of our Revenue As to the atute of the manufacturing districts, he was aware that some slight improvement had taken place in spine of them, and that what had been called disaffection, but which was in reality distress, was give from them. The topic referred to in the Speech was one of some deficacy—he meant the told, it was fer them to take the matter into their consideration. Now, he had always understood that it belonged to the Crown to recommend. Of course the Noble Lord or the Chancellor of the Exchequer would tell them hereafter what aum they thought suitable for this purpose, Ford Castleroigh, rose to answer the observations of the two fast speakers. With reference to what had just fallen from the Right Hon. Gentleman, he had to observe, that it was no reproach to the Speech from the Throne, that there was no topic in it on which he could make severe comments. And because the Speech had not alluded to the agricultural interests it was o be inferred, s m the Hog. Mc the third bench (Mr. Curwen) seemed to bold, that his Majesty was ignorant or insensible to the heavy distresses which presied on that most important source of our national prosperity. He was sure that, if that Hon. Member would took at the Speech, he would see no disposition to conceal the fact, nor any insensibility to the inconvenience which must accrue from the depression of that valuable class of men. . He could assure the Right Hop. Gentleman, that Ministers were as surflows to maintain peace as he could be a but he must deprecate the musion, which he did not think at all consistent with the anxious wish he expressed for the preservation of peace, that this country should dictate what others should do. He really thought, that if they wished to waintain tranquillity, they ought carefully to avoid showing too great a spirit of intermeddling with other Powers.

With respect to the remarks of the Right Hon. Gendeman on that part of the Speech which adverted to a provision to-the Queen, he had only to say, although it might have been more, usual for the Crown to recommend generally, and to leave it to Parliament to fix the sum, so long as the same cud was answered by the present mode, he could see no substantial objection to be made to it. He would take that opportunity to give notice that, on Wednesday in the casuing week, he was to make a proposition on the subject of a suitable pecuniary provision for the Queen. He named Wednesday, as Monday and Tuesday were days over which that House wind in the habit of adjourning. He should on that day make a proposition to the offert and he assured the World with the proposition to that effect, and he assured the House that he had none other with respect to her Majesty to make to Parnad none other with respect to her Majesty to make to Par-liament.—(Hear, hear!) In the loyalty of the country that Right Hon. Gentleman could not have more confidence that he (Lord Castlereagh) had. When there was danger from the expression of one set of opinious, he was sure it was only necessary to be distinctly inderstood that there was danger, that an opportunity should be sought to express the opi-nious of the loyal upon it. This would shew what the tem-per of the country was, and he well knew that no Miajatest would ever shew his face in that House, who had lost the confidence of the country.—(Cheers.) He could assure the confidence of the country.—(Cheere.) He could assure the lion. Gentleman who cheered for himself and him Optivities, that is long as they had not the confidence of these llovereign, of that Nouse, and of the country, they mistock the men they had to deal with, if they thought they would continue to conduct the affairs of the State. But so long as they did possess these requisites, no taunts that the Right Hon. Gentlemen could throw out, either personally or otherwise, should tempt him to retire.

Lord Folkstone denied that the voice of the country wait

Mr. Wolchouse observed, upon the taunts thrown out against those who algricd the loyal addresses, that they could not even thus manifest their attachment to the Throne withnot even thus manifest their attachment to the Throne without being stigmatized as servile dependents upon a wicked Government. But if men of his way of thinking ventured to express their opinions they were called dogs, dung-hild dogs, hole-and-corner men,—these were the phrases, and these were applied to them for supporting that Constitution which the Gentlemen opposite so often said they were ready to lay down their lives to support.—(Heur, hear!) As for fole-and-corner work, he would go into any corner to descince his sentiments. It was the power of expressing his opinions that was valuable to a Briton, and not the applause of a tumultwons body which might hear it (Hear.!) After some observations from Mr. Bischurst and Mr. Warre, the Address was carried without opposition. the Address was carried without appendition.

The Corporation of Dover have unanimously voted an Address of Congratulation to his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence on the birth of the infant Princess Elizabeth.

The Army.—The following is the report of the intended reduction of the army:—the whole of the Veteran battalions; in the three regiments of Guards, all the men under five feet eight inches high, in the three battalions of the first; those under five feet ten, in the Coldstreams; and five feet nine in the third regiment.

The Whig Journal of Friday last most unfairly states that the Duke of Wellington, in the House of Lords on Thursday evening, was pleased to observe that he did not think in any point of view, that the farce of a county meeting was at all necessary. This is a gross perversion of the sentiments of the illustrious Hero, who, on the contrary, stated that he did not mean to denominate County Meetings a farce being well aware that such Meetings were a part of a farce, being well aware that such Meetings were a part of the Constitution, and that when properly connected, public opinion might be expressed by them in a constitutional manner. His objection was to the calling a County Meeting in Hampshire, after the sense of the County had been so fficiently expressed, as he thought, by an Address signed by nine thousand Freeholders.

The Russian American Company has received news from its colony at Stilka, that there are Russian families in the North of Behring's Straits, whose ancestors were driven there by a storm about a century ago. The King v. Sir Francis Burdett.
Mr. Scarlett, in the absence of the Solicitor General, said that Mr. Scarlett, in the absence of the Solicitor General, said that a general understanding had gone abroad, that the defendant in this case would be brought up on Monday, to receive the judgment of the Court for the publication of a libel, of which he had been convicted at Leicester. WE have no room for remarks upon the debate of Friday night and yesterday morning: indeed, there is not much necessity for talking about it, the division proclaims the feeling of the country as loudly | was made by those gentlemen, that we were hireling as the motion itself has clearly shewn us the weak-

All the blustering of the Whigs and Radicals has ended in what? A motion by which the King's right to omit the Queen's name in the Liturgy, was to be questioned? No! A motion by which the effect was to be produced of re-inserting it? No! What then? a shifted shuffling thing, by which Ministers were to be turned out of their places for inability or misconduct, in advising the measure of striking it out at all.

Lord Archibald Hamilton (the brother of her Majesty's court) having cut and shaped, and pared and changed his announced motion under the direction of longer heads than his own, so as to make it palatable to the Whigs, who are notoriously mad to get in at any rate, and more especially without pledging themselves to do any thing for the Queen, about whom they care as little as they do for the King, or any body else except themselves, launched it; and, after a long debate, in which nothing is particularly to be remarked except the length and dulness of the opposition speeches, it was negatived by a Majority of ONE HUNDRED AND ONE! Need we add another syllable?

The Funds have continued rising ever since the meeting of Parliament.

COLONEL BROWNE. od lads lod ..

THE barbarous and inhuman observations upon the assassination of this gentleman in the Old Times newspaper, call for the strongest and most marked reprehension, The palliation of midnight murder is a new and somewhat extraordinary service for an English Journal to engage in. We turn from those who attempt to extenuate it, with a disgust, very little short of that which every Englishmen must feel for the diabolical perpetrators of the crime itself.

The Old Times, not content, however, with making murder in cold blood a matter of joke, is pleased to cast insinuations on the character of the sufferer on the present occasion. The Old Times should be told, that a more amiable or honourable man than Colonel Browne, does not exist. That his character in the army as a brave and experienced officer is established by his long and arduous services in the Peninsula war, under our illustrious Wellington, where he was several times wounded; that in all the private relations of life there is not a more estimable man, nor in society a man more generally sought and admired.

THE Baron Bergami has left Paris, with three carriages in his suite, and in all the splendour of high rank and great opulence. His resources are not doubtful—the money which he is thus lavishing he has received from the house of Coutts in London, bankers of the Queen. We confidently trust, that a clear statement will be laid before Parliament, of the amount actually expended for LAW CHARGES out of the enormous sums which have been drawn by her Majesty and her LEGAL advisers.

WE have received Mr. Theodore Hook's second letter. We are ready to confess, that we may have appeared to treat him too unceremoniously; but we will put it to his own feelings, whether the terms of his denial were not in some degree calculated to produce a little asperity on our part: we shall never be ashamed, liowever, to do justice, and we readily declare that we meant no kind of imputation on Mr. Hook's personal character.

I, William Shackell of Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, and No. 2, Gough-square, both in the City of London, Proprietor of the Sunday Newspaper, called JOHN BULL, make cath and swear, that the said Paper was not established at the suggestion, or under the direction, of any person or persons connected, directly, or indirectly with the Court or Government; and that I, the said William Shackell know, of my own knowledge, that no sum or sums of money whatever, have been at any time paid to the Proprietor, Editor, or Conductor of the said Paper for its support or maintainance by any person or persons-whatsoever; and further, that the Proprietor never has at any time had any communication with any Member of the Court or of the Administration, of any kind or nature on the subject of this Publication.

And I, the said William Shackell, do further make oath and swear, that the sale of the Two last Numbers of the said Paper, Nos. 5, and 6, has amounted, up to this day, to ten thousand two hundred and thirty copies.

vorn before me at the Mansion Louse, this 27th day of January,

J. T. THORP, Mayor.

We last week took occasion to notice an attack made upon us by Messrs. Meston and Wilson, at a parish meeting in the Borough, because an assertion of the Ministry.

We care very little for the abuse vented by the Radicals: first, because their dispraise is most to be desired; and, secondly, because, in the blindness of their malignity, they cut and slash at people who are as little connected with us as the Pope is. But there is published, (few of our readers know the fact, we dare say), a Weekly London Literary and Political Review, called-(probably by mistake) The Independent, which undertook, last week, to review the four first numbers of this Paper.

The conductor of that work might have continued reviewing and abusing, and calling names till dooms-day, unnoticed by us, had not his Review been put forth by her Majesty's booksellers, in token of which protection and patronage, it bears the Royal arms; and in the placards announcing it, the initials, C. R.

This identifies the paper with her Majesty; and, therefore, it requires a word or two. As it is notorious that the Queen is unable to write our language we acquit her of personal contribution to its pages but, from the indiscriminate (may we be allowed to say, injudicious) praise of her Majesty, and her whole Court-viz. Lady Anne Hamilton-it is evident that it comes from the only house in England where the opinions it gives forth are entertained.

In the outset of the review of JOHN BULL, an assertion made in the Borough, is repeated—that we are hirelings. This repreach, and all the other re proaches and abuses of a faction, stung and wounded by our exertion, we should laugh at, if we did not fear that our silence would implicate those whose political conduct we admire, and whose personal characters we esteem. In answer to all such remarks, we refer the "Independent" to the affidavit at the head of this article. We do not exactly know in what estimation oaths are held at Bran denburgh House, but we should think it would satisfy its inhabitants and partizans, that we are somewhat more independent of those whose cause we espouse than persons who assume the particular bearings of her Majesty as a passport to their paper, they being at the same time her Majesty's acknowledged tradesmen and retainers.

With respect to "nothing but falsehood in its most disgusting form," appearing in JOHN BULL, we can only say, as we said last week,—point it out: shew us where we are supposed to have erred, and ample apology shall be made, if we fail of sub-stantiating the facts we have adduced.

It is said we have made a covert attack upon the sobriety of the Queen. This is a mistake: our attack was a very open one. And, as for the " Independent," it is very easy for him to say, that a pretended correspondent asks Dr. Borland whether the Queen drank a bottle of Madeira at breakfast, at his house at Genoa, and another at dinner, &c. &c. But would it not be much easier to procure Dr. Borland, who could be a real correspondent, to deny the fact?-The Doctor is living at Kensington, as we said before his negative would be worth something to them. But where is it?

The "Independent" says, that we speak of the Queen as if "her Majesty had been judicially condemned." Why so she has been- as far as her trial went, a majority of her judges found her guilty. This really does not seem to be generally understood—one does not expect the "tinkers in armour," and "the damsels from Marybone," to be particular or correct in their views of political questions, but, even respectable people appear to have taken up the idea, that the Queen's innocence was esta-blished by a division in her favour; whereas, the fact is, (and it never can be too often repeated) that her guilt is recorded by a majority of her judges— a majority three times as large as that which in France doomed the unfortunate Louis to the scaffold; nine times as large as that which produced the impeachment of Lord Melville a few years since, and larger even than that which seated William III. on the throne of England.

As for our remarks on Mrs. Brougham, we never inferred that she had been more indulgent than she ought to her husband before marriage. We merely know that the announcement of the birth of Mr. Brougham's child followed that of his marriage sooner than such events generally do, for which all the papers of the day are our witnesses; but as we are on the subject, if the " Independent" could inform us in what part of England Mr. and Mrs. Brougham were actually married, we and many of our correspondents would thank him. And it would be doing her Majesty service, inasmuch as such infoation would naturally increase the value of Mrs. Brougham's countenance.

1 amiable Lady; and we admit that it was cruelatrocious, to have dragged her before the public under the circumstances in which she is placed; but who so dragged her? Not we; but those who so pompously biazoned her support of the Queen as an evidence of immacrate purity and good conduct, sufficient to comperbalance the testimony of all the other women in kingland.

As for the catalogue of the Queen's virtues coming from her Mujesty's bookseller, it is of as rauch value as a horse-dealers enumeration of the good qualities of a broken down 14p which he wants to sell, and as for the probity, fidelity, and distuterestadness of Indy Anne Hamilton, we never meant to peared with them. All we observed is, that if she has been faithful and affectionate to her Mate the has been no more than she ought to have m, the ving been paid for it.

With respect to our strictures upon her Majesty's visit to a Concest at the Mansion House, we repeat as for identifying her Majesty with all the obscene density me we are not in the least anxious do do so in this case. Allow the stories told by up will the rest

The "Independent" after proceeding to review Your of our Numbers, (not five), without answering any one of our questions or refuting except by a sweeping praise of its mistress any of our assertions, any we have no hesitation in declaring that ther. Majesty is entitled not only as "the first in wink, but as the first in VIRTUE and in TALENTS to be at the head of the females of England.

Having said this, we verily believe the " Independent" can have no hesitation in saying any

We have finished this part of our subject, and having cumorily noticed the "Independent" as a "political" work, we will just take a look at it as " a Literary" publication.

We, however, shall be more malicious than usual in this proceeding, we will let it speak for itself. We give our readers five specimens of original peetry which appear in it, and leave them to judge of its merits.

LONDON EDUCATION CLOTHING SOCIETY.—The Anniversary Meeting of this Society was held on Wednesday at the London Tavern. Mr. Brougham, who was in the chair, gave a very gratifying account of the benefits derived by the rising generation from this institution; and his observations were amply borne out by the Report of the Secretary. The Rev. Rawland Hill was of opinion, that education alone would be but of little avail, unless it was accompanied by religious instruction; for those who had but a little education were often found to make a most abominable use of it.—The healthy appearance of the children, who were introduced, afforded general satisfaction.

A Gentleman at Manningtree, Essex, breaking up s corn putch for firewood lately, a false bottom was discovered, containing three wrappers, each containing ten guineas, of the seign of George II.

THE QUEEN'S VISITORS.

The Queen received her mends on Saint Monday, as usual. The glass-blowers shewed her their bottles and lustres; and the industrious classes (who had nothing else to do) marched out to Hammersmith, which, according to placards posted about the streets, they were graciously permitted to do, " free of expence."—The tinkers paid her Majesty a second visit, some of whom were curiously dressed in copper hats and tiu breeches. This carrying brass to Brandenburgh is something like carrying coals to Newcastle.

The Morning Post, with an air of flippancy, talks of our pretended special information about Mrs. Hume and her not having visited the Queen. The Morning Post may have better authority than we have for saying what it does, but our authority for disayowing Mrs. Hume's visit to her Majesty, is the lady's father; and our authority for denying the fact of Mrs. Denman's having seen her Majesty, is Mrs. Denman herself.

TO JOHN BULL.

Sin-In the third number of your estimable paper, where treating of those females who have disgraced themselves by visiting the Queen, I perceived the following observation:—" Mrs. Archdeacon Bathurst, Lady Rush, Mrs. W. Madocks, and Mrs. Taylor, defy our research, &c. &c. As to three of these ladies, I really know nothing; but Lady Rush is easily heard of, at 26, Pall-Mall, which is the town residence of her husband, Sir William Beaumaris Rush, an old and honourable naval officer, and than whom His Majesty has not in his dominions a more truly loyal subject; a man who has given substantial proofs of his loyalty; for, to my knowledge, he has not for many years, drawn a farthing of his half-pay; and during the late war he raised a corps of Yeomanry at his residence in Surrey, without putting the county to the least expence.

Sir William was well known to, and much liked by our late good old King, who conferred the honour of Knighthood on him in 1800, when he was High Sheriff of Suffolk, in which county, as also in Essex, he has very considerable landed estates.

Having now Sir, informed you who Sir William and Lady Rush are, permit me to add, that at the time their names appeared in the Bergamise Gazettes, as having called on the Queen, they were actually staying at Brighton; and I can positively aver, they never did call at Brandenburgh House.

With equal truth am I enabled to state, that Lady Sarah Butler has not been there; a piece of intelligence that cannot fail to be acceptable to her high-minded countrymen, who feel themselves sufficiently disgraced by their Peer of highest of rank having forced his amiable wife to do an act so repugnant to her well-known feelings, of what is due to female reputation, which ought at all times be dearer to woman than her life.

Lady Grosvenor refused to obey her husband's mandate in this instance; and I believe it is the only one in which she ever disobeyed her Lord: but her Ladyship foresaw the disgrace that must attach to any female who would visit a woman of such character.

If you can spare a corner in your excellent constitu-tional paper, you will much oblige your friend,

His Majesty opened the Session of Parliament in person on Tuesday last, and never was sight more gratifying to the real friends of the country.

The late King in going to the House passed from St.

James's through the Park, and His present Majesty while James's through the Park, and His present Majesty while Regent took the same road, it being customary for the Sovereign to proceed from his Palace to Parliament; but since the commencement of this reign, Carlton House being the actual residence of the King, the procession moved directly thence through the streets to Westminster, which afforded the people a better opportunity of beholding their Monarch.

The crowd was immense and the applause tumultuous. Hats and handkerchiefs waved along the whole line of march, and men and women seemed to vie with each other in demonstrations of joy at seeing their King.

If the voice of humble individuals such as could be supposed to reach the Throne, we would exert corselves in calling upon His Majesty to let us see him more frequently—in praying him to mix more amongst us, and refute by his appearance in our streets and public places, the calumnies vented against his fine person and gracious manners; thus rendering contemptible and innocuous the shameful libels and caricatures now so plentiful, in which one of the handsomest men in the country, and decidedly the most finished gentleman of the age, is held up to the people as a most deformity and ill beseding.

TO JOHN BULL. Siz,—I know no duty more peculiarly within the province of a British House of Commons, then the exercise of a jealous vigilance over the channels into which its pecuniary bounties are directed by their grantees. It maintain that, that which is granted liberally should be maintain that, that which is grafted liberally should be applied not only wisely, but to purposes strictly national. When this is the case, I decidedly agree with the enlightened and sober authority of Mr. Justice Bayley, (however, it may be controverted by the Sir Oracles of the Edinburgh Review and Morning Chronicle), that taxes are no drawback on national prosperity. It appears from their evidence before the House of Lorda, that both Count Oliveirs and Chewelier Vassali receive pensions from her Majesty's bounty. Well aware, as I am, of the liberality of that August Personage's disposition. I humbly conceive it to be incumbent at the ensuing meeting of Parliament, before a specific annual income is voted to her Majesty, to move a humble Address to her, that she would be graciously pleased to lay before the House a list of all pensions granted, and allowances made by her to Aliens since the year 1814, specifying the amount, dates, and services rendered by the holders. I should then propose that the GROSS sum thus got at, should be deducted from such annual income as Parliament in its wirdow, under all the circumstances of the case may conceive her to be intitled to. Allow me to subscribe myself, friend Bull, your singless all wither, well wisher.

The House met at a quarter before two o'clock, and went up with the Address, in answer to His Majesty's most gracious

That this House will not receive any Petition for Private Bills after Friday, the 9th of February; - that no Private Bill be read the first time after Monday, the 5th of March; -- and that no Report of such Private Bill be received after Thursday, the 19th of April next. PRIDAY.

The influx of strangers into the gallery this day, was very great on account of the motion of Lord A. Hamilton respecting the Liferey,

A Petition was presented by C. Farquiar, Esq. against the return for Tregony. Ordered for consideration on the 13th of February.

A Petition from Mr. Bryant respecting the return for Aldborough was ordered to be taken into consideration on the 13th of March.

Sir J. Newport gave notice of a motion for Thursday next, respecting a certain publication which he deemed a libel on both Houses of Parliament.

Petitions were presented from the city of York, Carlisle, St. Mary, Bermondsey, and Rotherhithe and an immense number of other places, for the restoration of the Queen's name to the Liturgy.

The House in a Committee of Supply agreed to a resolution for granting a supply to His Majesty.

MOTION TO RESTORE THE QUEEN'S NAME TO

THE LITURGY. Lord A. Hamilton rose, and after laying on the table a petition, respecting the Queen, from the town of Lanark, proceeded to address the House.—He said he never remembered in the whole course of his Parliamentary duty, an occasion when it became more neces sary for him to intreat the indulgence of the House, both with reference to the individual who had to address them, and to the subject upon which he was to occupy their time. It would be quite superfluous when the number of pathiens on the table must have unanswerably declared it, to insist on the inherent importance of this motion, or the interest which the public had in it. The first and obvious impression which every man had upon this subject was, the general ferment which pervaded the country from the moment the proceedings against her Majesty commenced—a ferment which not only extended to that House, and prevented it from atextended from one corner of the country to the other, interrupting even the ordinary occupations of the people. He was aware, that in taking up this question, it might be said that he had adopted it because he thought it would make an excellent party question, and might be perverted to the promotion of party views, it was not to be imputed to him that he was awayed by any party bias (without meaning, at the same time, to disclaim a fair political hostility to the Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House because, in his conception, he ventured to offer nothing to the House, which was not a subject in-volving the responsibility of Ministers. This being his view, he believed he was not hable to the imputation of intending in this motion any thing personally disrespectful to the Sovereign. The first observatives which occurred to him on a consideration of this matter was, that he did not think it possible—(and he wished to hear an exposition of the sentiments of Ministers upon it) that restters could as they now were. He thought it was impossible that her Majesty should continue to be marked by this stigms, and be recognized by the Government and Legislature by the addition of a were perturbary establishment. Her name was another than the Liturgy at a time when she had little reason to expect that fuch an act would have been committed against her. If her Majesty was to be tried for subsequent acts, to which she might have boen driven, then let subsequent irritations and acts of in-justice against her be taken fillio account also. But the principle of such a proceeding was willolly unjustifiable, and its practice to be compared only, as was well ob-served by a Noble Friend of the Cold Nugent), to the inquisitor, who laid the violent on the rack, and took his exprehiments properly and the view of the said of the content of t Hjured. What was her situation at the time? She was without a home or a station. The laws of her country had deceived her, for they fold her size was Queen. In her estimate of the ollingation of domestic life, she was clustery deceived—for she was a wife, and had no hus-She left this country with what he would almost sall a letter of licence, and instead of being treated in sonformity to what appeared to be the effect of this letter, she was followed by spies, and hunted by diplomatic agents. Every where she set her foot, she was treated by the Ministers with nothing but contumely, and no prorection of consolation in any quarter. As to the Or-ders in Council, he contended, that they never had any other than a negative effect. He strongly denied that the 13 and 14 of Car, the Second was an authority for the Order in Council. That Act simply empowered the king in Council for a alter the names of the Royal Ring in Council for alter the names of the royal Paintly, as occasion would require, but not to omit way of them. The Noble Lord continued to say, that only one name observation occurred for him on the country of the name of the country of the one of the one of the country of the one of the one of the organization of the one of the organization that only one innite observation occurred to him on the audited of this supposed authority, which the Oracle in Council devised from the Act of Uniformity.—

H. pretended to have no knowledge) it was most desirable that he should in his place state whether such a difference had taken place, and whether he had differed from his colleagues from principle.-And did not the Right Hon. Gentleman keep his ciple.—And did not the hight hon, centieman keep his place during the whole of the proceedings, until at length, for some reasons as yet unexplained, he thought proper in the end to cease to act with Ministers.—(Hear.).—What credit then, should be given him, or how far could his subsequent and late desertion from the responsibility of publications of that lic affairs discharge him from his former obligations of that The Noble Lord after a variety of observation respecting the proceedings against the Queen, concluded with moving "That it is the sense of this House, that the order of Council of the 12th of February, by which the omission of Her Majesty's name in the Littingy was occasioned, was most ill-advised, and inexpedient."

Mr. C. R. Bill defended the conduct of Mr. Canning. while had taken an early opportunity of declaring that he would take no part in the proceedings against the Queen. And from the time that all hopes of an adjustment failed. by the miscarriage of the Address of the House to Her Majesty, he withdrew himself sltogether, and left the kingdom. He was absent during all the proceedings in the other house, but returned after the Bill of Pains and Penalties was withdrawn. Finding then that the new state of things approached too nearly to that which he had objected to, he became sensible that a continuance in office was incompatible with his former professions, and he had no other course left but to surrender his employments. But Be was glad to have this opportunity of saying, that, though Mr. Canning had withdrawn himself from office, he did not, by any means, wish to shrink from the responsi-bility which attached to his colleagues. (Ifear!)

Mr. Robinson contended that the Crown had a discretionary power under the Act of Uniformity, and treating the matter candidy, it was not easy to look at the conduct of Ministers, in advising the omission of Her Majesty's name in the Liturgy, without also taking into account all the circumstances which preceded and accompanied that ad It was well known that their Majesty's had lived separate for many years—that that separation had been in some measure sanctioned by the late King, and recognized by more than one Act of the Legislature. Ministers were also sensible that, one day or other, the question would be brought before the House; and they had sufficient proof in their hands to warrant the exclusion of Her Majesty's name. (Hear!) How then could Ministers confer a personal honour on the Queen by restoring her name to the Liturgy, under the circumstances which he had mentioned. Had the law, indeed, been imperative, it would have relieved Ministers from a great difficulty. It would have been more agreeable to have no discretion. They were compelled by the proofs they held in their hands, to bring the Queen to trial. (Hese!) Centlemen might be incredulous but he was not now going into a vindication of the mea-sures which Ministers had taken. At a proper time he and his colleagues would meet the House on the subject, and not shrink from the most satisfactory explanation. (Hear!) But the Noble Lord said that this motion would steer a middle course, and that, without addressing the King directly, it would at least convey to his Majesty a hint of the feelings of the Bouse of Commons. A Bint !- Was this the language to be used on an momentous a subject as the present? He contented that it was not the proper mode of conveying the feelings of the House of Commons to the foot of the Throne; and that, if Ministers had acted in the very criminal way in which their conduct was represented; the House of Commons were bound in duty to take other steps than slight reprimands. On all these grounds, therefore, and because the proposition was not a fair and manly one, but rather a collateral issue upon an abstract point, which would not involve the case one way or the other, he should oppose the motion, and the fairest way he thought, of meeting it, was by moving that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. Hobbane agreed entirely with the Hon, Gentleman (Mr. Edie), that with regard to Mr. Canning, he should be allowed an oppositunity of defending himself before any attacks were made upon him. But whether he was attacked or not, or whether he was absent or prosenf, appeared to him, in the present state of things as of very little consequence, and the House should not be occupied with such discussions. The Right Honourable Gentleman hatl declined entering into the legal question, at the same time that he made a motion for adjourning the floure. He (Mr. H.) was no lawyer, but he thought the anna probendi, lay with Ministers to show that their acts were not illegal. He was not obliged to do so. Every lawyer knew well that there was no law for changing the formula of prayer; and, from the year 1546, to the present time, there was no instance of a Queen Consorts' name being omitted under the same circumstances as the present. There was, in-deed, one exception, manely—the Queen Consort of George the First; but her, case was hardly analogous to the present, for she was totally unknown to the people of this country, either as Queen, or Princess of Wales; and if she had never been prayed for, it was because she was not known at all to the persons who frequented the Court here-in fact, she was no part of the King's family, so far subject of it. Whatever had been done must be consist the civil State, except an Act of Parliament, and there-

Majesty. The question was of no less importance the -whether the law of the land invested the govern ment of this country with power to erase the name of the Queen Consort from the Liturgy of the Church; and it was a fallicy to suppose that a case of this kind could be that according to the Consustual Principle, which was, that according to the Consustuals Regul, the name of the Queen Consort had always been placed in the Liturgy along with that of the King, and that it could not be removed therefrom at the pleasure of the executive government; and therefore, whatever decision the House should come to, must rest upon the abstract question; whether a custom that had existed in this country for three centuries, should still be continued or overtumed. He now charged the Ministers of the Crows with having, on the 12th of February last, made an order respecting her Majesty, which was contrary a the Consuctudo Regni, and grossly illegal.—(Loud cries of Hear.) After the restoration, a general Church Liturgy was established by the Act of Uniformity, which had for its object to secure a civil recognition of all the component parts of the litstitutions of the country. The principle of that Act was, that the Church and the State were to be The principle of so united, that one should be recognised in the other. The effect of this Act was the complete settlement of the Liturgy, in the year 1661. This was done by Act of Parliament; and the Service of the Church was itself as much an Act of Parliament as if it had entered on the Parliament Roll. The House, therefore, in considering this question, was bound to look at the construction of the Act, of which the Liturgy formed a part. The Act of Uniformity declared, that the Liturgy should be printed, and made a part of the service of the Church; therefore the Liturgy was made an Act of Parliament. The Act did not contain any charge to estable the Crown to make an alteration in the Liturgy. The Crown had not the power to alter even a letter of it, except the power granted by one clause to which he should refer. They must, therefore, refer to the Act of Uniformity, in order to see what were the powers which belonged to the Crown. The clause to which he alluded was to this effect: "Provided always, and be it further emeted, that in all prayers relative to the Queen, and other branches of the Royal Family, the names may be altered from time to time, according to lawful authority," &c. Here then a power was given to the Crown to put out a name, and substitute another name according to circumstances, in its stead; but the act gave the King no power to erase the name of a person living at the finte; and if such a power was claimed, why was it not stated in the Act of Parliament? The Act was most elaborately revised by the greatest lawyers of the country. It was made after the rage of civil war had seased; and those who restored the monarchy never intended to degrade the Queen. The names of all the former Queens were in the Liturgy; and the act of uniformity followed the example of what had been done before; and was it to be supposed that the act gave the King a power to leave out the many of the Queen Consort? In the printed copy of the Prayor Bock, after the Act was passed, Charles II. not being thou married, there was a blank left for the name of a Queen Consort to in intention in the Charles II. be inserted in it. This was an argument to show that the Liturgy, established by the Act of Uniformity, was to be a complete copy of the Liturgies existing in the former reigns of James I. and Charles E. After this Act was passed, the names of the Queen of Charles II. and James II. were inserted in the Liturgy. The Learned Gentleman now proceeded to advert to some of the precedents on which his argument was founded. The circumstance of the name of the Queen of George I. was relied on. But that Queen never came to this country; her name was hardly known when the King resided in Hander, before he came over to this country; her name was not even mentioned. In-deed the King had been divorced for 18 years before from her; and she had been locked up as a prisoner in Ha-nover. Therefore her case could be no presedent. She could not, in law, be considered as a Queen, because she had been divorced by an Ecclesiastical Court. If any one had a right to be considered the lawful wife of Geo. L. it was the Duchess of Kendall, who had been united to him by a lest-handed marriage. Then it was impossible to lay this down as a precedent for leaving out the native of a lawful Queen Consort. The precedent was a miserable one, and every argument founded on it was sophis-tical and absurd. There was another principle on which tical and absurd. There was another principle on which he founded the rights of the Queen Consort. By the common law of the country the Queen had equal privileges with the King; and she had the privileges of a femme sole. These rights were not given her by the King, but by the law; and therefore it was not in the power of the King to take any of these rights away from her. There was no privilege enjoyed by the Queen which were not as well secured to her as those of the King were secured to him; and it might just as well be said, that the King could take away from her the name of Queen as any of her other privileges. He had consulted many lawyers and divines on this question, and they all agreed with him; and their opinion was, that if ambiguity did exist on any question rivileges, it must be construed in favour of her Majesty. He begged, therefore, as a plain humble man, that he might be permitted to ask the present Monarchical and Anti-Radical Ministers, whether the same power which had left the Queen's name out of the Liturgy might not have done the very same thing with regard to the name of the King .— (Ilear, hear!)— Were not the words of the Act equally applicable to the one as the other? He had carefully perused the Act of Uniformity, and he declared it as his opinion, that the hame of the one could not be left out without that of the other. The principle of that was, to unite the Church and the State; there was no power to alter any part of ture these could be no power to after the Ecclesiastical part, because they were both united together. hnown that Honrictte, Queen of Charles M. was the first object of attack upon the principle on which her present Majesty had been assailed. But that authority was not one which should be called into operation, as the act of expuncing her name from the Liturgy, had been folid by an attack upon the King himself, and was not likely to be cited as a precedent of any force upon the present occasion. It was the duty of Ministers to bring forward, if such a thing were in contemplation of the Crown, all the evidence which went to establish the neessity of such a proceeding, instead of doing which, they had put in array against her a tribunal such as had never before been resorted to, except in the memorable instance of the jurisdiction of the High Commission Court, which had exercised a gensuship morney over the Queen similar to that which was now established by the Privy Council.—(Hear, hear!)—Combining all those objections with the knowledge of the positive fact, that 8 out of 10 of the people of England were of opinion, that the whole proceedings against the Queen were unjust and inhuman; he could not but deprecate them with all is might, in the hope that immediate means would be taken to put an oud to a system which had caused so much agitation.—(Cheers.)

Dorter Dodsen contended, that the King had as much authority over the Church as the Pope had exercised before the Reformation, Sir J. Newport quoted the Irish Act of Uniformity, as evidence to prove that the right to exclude the Queen's name from the Liturgy, existed in Parliament alone. The Stante Law was, he said, as it stood conclusive.

The Attorney General expressed his surprise, that those who were dissatisfied with the act of omitting the Queen's name had not expressed their dissatisfaction twelve months ago. The reason was, not that the act was illegal, but that it was inconvenient. (Fistr.) They had already admitted that it was strictly legal. The whole argument of those who advocated the Queen was built upon the position, that the right of her Majesty was immutable; but they had not shown how she had any right of the kind. The Act of Uniformity gave no such right; and, notwithstanding the appellation of Star Chamber, which had been given to the authority from which the order had issued, the power that had been exercised was an existing legal power. The law upon the subject said the King had the power of "altering" e names in the Form of Common Prayer, which included "erasing." But there was no Prayer annexed to the Act for the Queen or the Royal Family. It remained with the King to fill up the blank, and if the King had no power to act, how could be fill up the blank? At the time of Charles II, there was no Queen Consoit. The blank was then filled up with the name of the Queen Downger. Omissions had frequently taken place. In the reign of George II, the name of Prince Frederick, who had been for some time prayed for, was struck out; and in that of Philip and Mary, the King was prayed for, and not the Queen.—(Hear; hear, and cries of, "Nhe is not 2ucen Consort")—No—she was Queen Regnant. The fore of prayer was, "Pro Rege et principion suic." The Hon, and Learned Member then contended, that there was neither law nor usage to sanction the right claimed by her Majesty; and he was much sur-prised to hear a gentleman of the attainments of his Hon. and Learned Friend, assert that the Queen was entitled to the special prayers of those whom he called her subjects. He never heard that a Queen in this country had any subjects; nor did he find the term subjects made use of, except in the addresses presented to the Queen, and the answers to them. Is was quite alear that this question was brought forward for party purposes; he would ask, if that was not the case, it would never have been introduced.—(Herr.)— It was charged against his Majesty's Ministers that they acted in an filegal manner. Now what was the fact? They had received information from abroad of the Queen having been guilty of such a degree of mison quired a solemn investigation; and were they then to be accused of acting illegally, because they had resolved upon an inquiry into the charges spainst her?—(Loud cheers.)

Str J. Machinionh then man, and after a few postiminary observations, said, that the late Order in Council was a violation of all the recognised principles of the British Constitu-tion. "His Monentuble Friend, the Momber for Westmington, and very aptly illustrated this point then with respect to the wife of George I. who was styled Duchess of Zell, all that could be said was, that she inherited that title from her fa-ther who was Duhe of Zell, and her assuming it after the was separated from her husband, proxed that she was held to be divorced, to all intents and purposes. The Honournble and Learned Gentleman then proceeded to examine in detail all the carlous stantice enacted in reference to the question, and desired the correctness of the interpretation gives to them by the Attorney-General. He contended that the high authority of Lord Clarendon, and Sir Matthew Hale, was against the Monorable and Learned Gentleman. He then proceeded to contend, that the exclusion of Prince George of Denmask-from the Litargy, was no precedent in support of the exclusion of Her Present Majesty, because the 25th Section of the Act of uniformity did not contemplate the Consort of Queen regnant. Amorge was the husband of Anne, and he did not come auder the other part of the description, namely, "the royal progeny." But the Princess Sophia's name was inserted, as she was one of "the royal progeny" —a person towards whom Anne hand no friendly feelings. When he first heard of this measure, he supposed that Ministers were at least secure as to the legality of what they did. But he was now fully convinced of the imbecility of their case. Much was said of bolding the scales of justice with an even hand, before the trial of her Majorty. And yet, before that trial, by the omission of her name from the Liturgy, they caused it to be proclaimed in twenty thousand pulpits that she was an adultress. He was convinced that most this subject there was, in fact and in truth, no division upon this subject there was, in fact and in truth, no division of opinion in this House. No men could lay his hard on his heart and say that he did not deploye this as a most unfortupate measure, though many, most inconsistently, as he thought; atili went on 40 support an administration which had committed such an error.—(ther, heart)—The opinions of the public were decided, and most ardent against this most enhappy measure. The feeling of the people alone was sufficient to call on the Throne for the abundonment of all hostile pro-ceedings against the Queen. They fest that the was degraded before trial—prosecuted without sufficient cause, and endurcoured to be punished without conviction.

The Splicitar General slid not think that the served of this question was calculated to allay the dissurtants which were and to exist in the country—(beer, hear).—He referred to the negociation which took place, and concended, that at that time her Majesty's advisers easented to negociate for an equivalent for the omission of her Majesty's mane from the Liturgy. Some new lights, he supposed, had broken in upon Gent emen, since there was a time, and that not very remote, when this ounission was considered as a "trifle as light as air." He then proceeded to argue, that according to the act of uniformity and to established usage, it was competent to the Crown to change the names in the Liturgy by its more will and flat. He meintained that the Queen had no more right to complain of not having her name inserted in the Liturgy, than the whole body of the "Boyal Progeny" had of not being prayed for

Mr. Scarlett contended, that if the power contended for was in the King, it was also in his power to alter the whole of the Liturgy. But even had he the power, it was contrary to all principles of justice to exercise it and degrade the Queen, who was then about to be put apon her trial.

Level Cashlerengh, then rose to appose the motion, amidst cries from every part of the House. The Noble Lund want on to argue, that in this question the Hon Gentlemen apposite had test sight entirely of the Queen, and were only occupied with their plans of aggrandizing tuningsides, and getting into power. A great deal had been said of the illegatity of the measures taken by Government, but that was now gous by—these was no doubt but that the King in Council, and in discretionary power with regard to the insertiop of the Queets's name in the Liturgy. The present motion was but a trick to cutch vous; by framing a proposition which did not directly consure Ministers, but was collaterally directed against them. The fractions of this metion expected to have some Members with them, who they knew to be decidedly bostile to them on the general views of the case. But after all, what would be the effect of the spotion? would it succeed in restoring her Majosty's name to the Liturgy, which was the precise object? Certainly not. He did not think his friend near him treated the question, so framed and so indirect, in an unbecoming way, by moving an unmediate adjournment of the House upon it. Much had been said of the Queen's legal right to have her name in the Liturgy. To bim it did not appear to come within the definition of a "right." He had hever cond in any writer that it had been trunked as such. Bluckstone, though very particular in describing the rights of the Queen Comort, said not a word of her right to be prayed for. It was clearly a matterenticely within the King's discretion. And if her Majesty had a legal right to it, why were her law advisers silent so long. Surely it was never unimated, but that if she applied to the Privy Council, her complaints would be referred to a committee of the Privy Council, where they would be investigated by those eminant Law Authorities whose busibe investigated by those eminant Law Authorities whose measures it was to adjudge concerning captures and prizes. And he should again any, that with regard to the law of the case, there was nothing at all in the wording of the clause in the Act of Uniformity, which Hunted the discretion of the King in Coun-Uniformity, which Hunted the discretion of the King in Council; indeed, by the very group of the law, the King seemed to be looked upon as the person the most qualified to settle all matters concerning the Royal Family. And it never could be the policy of the Legislature to look with suspicion upon that sare so entrusted to the covereign. For would it escape the observation of the House, that the education and marriages of all the branches of the Royal Family were entirely under the King's controul; and it would be a most daugerous principle indeed, if Paciament were to interfere with him in an affair, which was clearly connected with the internal management of his domestic household.— and, really, when gentlemen talked of the hardship which the Queen suffered in the late trials to which her Majcaty had been put, he could not bely remaindthem at the way in which see was treated in 1806, when Lord Erskine was an tops of her judges. It had been the boast of Lord Erskine, that he would have no nort of trial but that by jury; and yet, in what way we've the precedings in 1806 conducted supon a principle of the agent in quisitorial secrety, turk nown to, and without the privity of the defendant, and a judgment, as it was in fact, pronounced spon her by her father and her flovereign hefore she had any nation of it, but went she learned from sommon report Let them cease, thus bounting the servants of the Crown with putting her Majesty to an unjust or opprassive trial, or bringing her conduct to issue on proofs which they knew to be incupable of sustaining a charge, For who that looked into the proceedings in the other House, to which he was now as liberty to allude, that would venture to easy, that House did not find her Majesty guilty of what had been charged to her. And if, because Ministers, from the great delay of bringing the question before the House of Commons, and consented to give it up, was it not clear, from the Protests of the Peers themselves, that they thought the charges made out against the Queen. There was nothing in that tria", or any thing attending it, which made him regret that such steps had. then taken, when any s. spi at all became usee may; and the fore his God, the Noble Lord protested, that if the same news sity occurred again, and that he had the misfortene to be placed once more in the same embarraceing dirementances, he would again recommend and take precisely the same steps; but he could not consent to any thing which would compromise the dignity of his Sovereign; and fooling as he did on the case, he felt himself hound in consciouce to oppose the motion, and support the amendment of his Right Hou. DRURY LANE. - Miss Wilson has repeated the character of Mandane several times: we confess, however, that our first expectations of her merits have hardly been realized :- much of that which we attributed to timidity, turns out to be want of skill; and associated as she is in our minds with Miss Stephens, we turned to our favourite at Covent Garden with longing says. poared on Thursday to particular advantage; this fassinating woman wins upon the public every time they see her. We confess, that the brilliant spackle of her eye is more bewitching in some characters; but whatever she does, she does well. Bealman was not in particularly fine singing voice, but Mr. More really surprised us by his performance of Artabanes in the song of "Your Father you lost," &c. he was literally excellent.

The farce was "The Devil to Pay:"-Munden Jobson was irresistible; and Alias Kelly, as the as vulgarity went, was equally good in Nell.

We noticed that the books of the opera sold in the Lobbies, were old aditions with new titles.—this is, perhaps, economy: it, however, has the effect of rendering the book perfectly useless, and of greating a strong sensation of disgust at the system introduced into this Thoutes by the sapient and anlightened directors, Mesers. Calcraft and Moore.

A STATE OF THE STA

MONDAY, JAN. 29.

This day is the King's accession to the throne. A holiday at all the public offices.

The preparations for the Coronation in Westminster Hall are now proceeding, and rumour fixes the mouth of May for this splendid spectacle.—M. Post.

In the Court of Exchequer on Saturday, the Barons re-fused the application of Mr. Parkins, the late Sheriff, to be allowed to name his own secondary.

The King held a splendid Court on Friday and Setus day, on which latter day, the Address of the Corporation of Dublia was presented in full assembly to His Majesty. Soon after the breaking up of the Court, the King left town for Brighton in his travelling carriage, escorted by a party of Light Horse.

The "Berlin Gazette" announces, that the great commercial house of Berk'ner and Co. have stopped payment.

The accounts of the Revenue of Ireland have been presented to the House of Commons. The whole receipt for the financial year, ended Jan. 5, 1820, were 4251,9021. That for the year ended Jan 5, 1821, is 3,605,4461, being a reduction in one year of 646,456l.

At one time on Friday night there were 576 Members in the House of Commons. The greatest division which ever took place was 546. The Members who divided on Saturday morning were 519 in amount: so that it would seem that 57 had left the House before the division took place. Had not this been the case, it is ascertained that the nett majority against the Queen would have been little short of 150.

RECORDER'S REPORT.—Saturday the Recorder made a Report to his Majesty of the Convicts under sentence of death in Newgate, capitally convicted in December Sessions last, when Joseph Colvin, Henry Tobin, Joseph Martin, James Reeves, Joseph White, and Jöhn Davis, for highway robberies, were ordered for execution on Wednesday next.—The others were respited during pleasure.

Paris Papers to the 26th inst. arrived yesterday. The Chambers continue to be occupied with unimportant objects. Intelligence of the 9th from Naples, states, that in consequence of the complete re-establishment of tranquility, Courts Marshal have been suppressed throughout Sicily. The King has sent to the Parliament an authenticated copy of the letter addressed to him by the King of France. Comments, we are told, have been made upon it by the patriotic papers, but the nature of those comments is not mentioned. Hints are given that the friends of independence are preparing some important movement in Piedmont, which would be likely to produce a useful diversion in favour of Neapolitans, in case of war. This explains the reason why the King of Sardinia has signified to the Allied Powers that he could not allow his troops to pass beyond his frontiers to join those of Austria. A French frigate is said to have captured an Independent privateer near St. Thomas's, after an action, in which the frigate had 25 killed, and the privateer 65.

CONSTITUTIONAL ASSOCIATION for OPPOSING the PROGRESS of DISLOYAL and SEDITIOUS PRINCIPLES. President—SIR JOHN SEWELL, Knt. LLD. Extracts from the Address:—
"The Members of the Society have adopted the following Resolutions:—

"lst. That they will use their best exertions to maintain order, and to support the due execution of the Laws.
"M. That they will employ their influence, individually and collectively, in discountenancing and opposing the dissemination of seditious principles.

tively, in discontenancing and opposing the american or restriction principles.

3.4. That they will encourage persons of integrity and talent in the Literary World to exert their abilities in confuting the sophistries, dissipating the illusions, and exposing the faisehoods, which are employed by winked and designing men to mislead the people.

4. 4th. That they will resort to such lawful measures as may be deemed expedient to restrain the publishing and circulating of seditious and treasonable libels.

5. In oper to attain these ends, it has been determined—

1. To establish a Fund, by the voluntary contributions of the members, at such rate as each individual may think fit.

THE NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. The Publishers of the New Monthly Magazine, have the pleasure to acquaint their subscribers and the publia, that they have now completed their arrangements for conducting the New Series of this Journal in a manner that will, they trust, meet with their decided approphation.

Aware that the taxte fer Liberary Essays has long since increased far beyond the means of gratification afforded by the Old Magazines, they have enlarged their plan in order more fully to gratify the public curiosity, and have at the sume time met the wishel of their subscribers by printing the original Essays in a large type, similar to those in the Quarterly and Edinburgh Reviews. They have also still further improved on the old plan by arranging the pages so that the Miscellaneous departments of the Magazine will form a distinct volume at the end of the year, thus combining in the same work the several characters of a Magazine, a Review, and an Ausual Register.

Under the superintendance of the present, Editor, the pages of this Journal will be devoted to the contributions of persons of the highest talent, it being the determination of the publishers to present to the world a Journal adapted in every respect to the present state of society and its increasing desire of knowledge and perfectability.

On the EMBELLISHMENTS to this Worls, will in future be of, a very superior order. The next Portrait will be that of SIR HUMPHRY DAVY, accompanied by an authentic Memoir of the Life, Scientific Discoveries, &c.

COURT OF KINGS' BENCH .- SATURDAY.

The King, v. Sir F. Burdett.

The Attorney-General moved the judgment of the Court on: the defendant in this case.

The defendant immediately appeared in Court accompanied by Mr. Hobbouse, and took his sent in the front of his Counsel, Mr. Scarlet and Mr. Denman.

Mr. Justice Best read his notes taken at the trial.

The defendant banded in an immense number of affidavity, and Mr. Scarlett had a vast number more to read, but there being some informality in the same, the Court ordered the further hearing of the case to be postponed till Wednesday. Of course we shall next week give a more detailed report.

"Yesterday, within about a quarter of five o'clock, a very violent explosion was heard in the Castle of the Tailevies. It was immediately ascertained to have proceeded from a small barrel of gunpowder, which had been placed behind a wooden barrel of gunpowder, which had been placed behind a wooden chest that stood on the stair case of the castle. Several shorp and panes of glass were broken. The Prefect of Police, the Attorney General, and the First Advocate General, the King's Attorney, and his Deputy, instantly repaired to the spot, and proceeded to take informations for the discovery of the authors of this daring violence."—Mentteur, Jan. 28.

THURSDAY.

The Earl of Liverpool laid on the table a copy of the despatches sent to the Foreign powers at Troppau, (a reply to their circular) dated 19th July, 1820. In answer to a question from Lord Holland, the noble Earl said that the document had been sent to all the governments in Europe, and to the Brazils. Adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

As the extreme length of the debate prevented us on Sunday from giving the reply of Mr. Alderman Heygate to the allusion made to him by Mr. Brougham in the debate on Lord A. Hamilton's motion, we now insert a more full and correct report of it:-

Mr. Alderman Heygate said, that uninjured as he felt himself by the attack of the Hon. and Learned Gent. (Mr. Brougham) he had no wish, rising unexpectedly, and at that hour of the morning, unnecessarily to protract the contest. He would, however, tell that Hon. and Learned Gentleman (never more ingonious than to-night, and never less convincing) that he was not vain enough to imagine that the trap which had been alluded to was set by the Noble Lord (Lord A. Hamilton) for so humble an individual as himself. But, at all events, he gave credit to the Honourable and Learned Gent. for having discovered, at an early period of his speech, that he (Mr. H.) was not likely to be its victim; a sagacity, at which he wondered the less, when he called to mind the small success of the recent effort of that Hon. and Learned Geatleman, to catch and manage another Alderman. But his were light and playful surcasms, and far less terrific than the heavy artillery brought to bear against him a few evenings since from another quarter Mr. Hume). On that occasion, the weighty epithets of "bar-barous and unmanly" were lavished upon the line of argument he had then thought it his duty to pursue, and which, whatever faults it had, was at all events clear, straight forward, and decided—lavished upop him because he had ventured, uncon-meeted with party, to allude moderately, openly, in his place in Parliament, in the face of her Majesty's Advisers, official and extraordinary, and for his own justification with his constituents, to public documents bearing the name of the Queen, and circulated with indefatigable industry, to the remotest corners of her Sovereign's dominions. He professed not to conjecture, and must leave it to the House to decide, whether the method pursued for putting him down was adopted because bester arguments were not to be found, or whether it was intended to afford in his person an example of that degree of li-berty of speech and freedom of debate which would be hereafter allowed to individuals who dared to speak their own opinions, by some of those to whom he alluded, when they should have attained that power which they new so confidently anticipated, But he could not doubt that the British House of Commons would, in spite of this system of terror, show by their decision that night, that they were resolved still to support the majesty of the Throne, and the constitutional authority of the legislature; and that no individual, however illustricus by birth, or exalted by rank, not even the Queen Consort, the first subject of the State, should be able, with impunity, to suffer her name to be used even without design, as the vehicle of sentiments at variance with the first principles of civil liberty, because calculated to induce the interference of emilitary, because calculated to induce the interference of emilitary, because of the control cause calculated to induce the interference of a military body in political affairs, in opposition to the Crown which commands, and to the Parliament which pays it. As to the motion now before the House, he hoped in a few minutes to shew the Hon. and Learned Gentleman, that, however refined and candid be might be called, he was able to come to a decisive conclusion at last. He objected to the motion, as he did to some of the Answers of the Queen, and for the same reason. The maxims were true in the abstract, but mischievous in the application. If carried, this motion was to be followed by others in endless succession; and it would tend only, in his judgment, to prolong the unhappy agitation of the public mind, and to interrupt still further the important business of the nation. He felt con-fident the House would that night endeavour by their vote, to draw a veil over transactions neither creditable nor beneficial to the parties concerned. He would add only one word more. He was no supporter of Ministers, nor an enemy to the Queen; on the contrary, he sincerely wished—no one could wish it e sincerely—that her Majesty might continue, after so ewentful a career, to enjoy, during many and happler years, which a suitable dignity and with credit, discretion and repose, the ample income which he doubted not the liberality of Parwould in a few days provide.

THE QUEEN.

Lord Castlereagh moved the order to go into Committee on that part of His Majesty's message which referred to making a provision for the Queen.

Mr. Brougham immediately presented the following mes-sage from the Queen:—

"CAROLINE R

"The Queen having learnt that the House of Commons has appointed this day for taking into consideration the part of the King's most gracious Speech which relates to her, deems it necessary to the contract of the Management of th cessary to declare, that she is duly sensible of His Majesty's condescension in recommending an arrangement respecting her to the attention of Parliament. She is aware that this recommendation must be understood as referring to the support of her estate and dignity; and, from what has lately passed, she is apprehensive that such a provision may be unaccompanied by the possession of her rights and privileges, in the ample measure wherein former Queens Consort, her Royal Predecessors, have been wont in time past to enjoy them.

"It is far from the Queen's inclination needlessly to throw common with the whole country, and which she desires in common with the whole country, and which she feels persuaded the best interests of all the parties equally require; and being most anxious to avoid every thing that might create irritation, she cautiously abstains from any observation upon the unexampled predicament in which she is placed. she feels it due to the House and to herself, respectfully to declare, that she perseveres in the resolution of declaring any arrangement while her name continues to be excluded from the

"Brandenburgh House, January 31, 1821."
On the question for the Speaker leaving the Chair.—Mr. Western objected to granting the public money without explaby the verdict of 183 Peers—he deprecated the idea of laying 59,000t. burthen on the people, after Ministers had said that the Queen was an adulteress. He was determined to oppose the proposul; unless the distresses of the country are insuinced in the people.

Lord Castlereagh regretted the Hon. Gent. should have come to such a determination. It was needless to argue on such an opinion. He would advert to the message which had been delivered from her Majesty:—in effect, that she would accept of no provision unless her name was restored to the Liturgy, Here her Majesty would have nothing to dread of the exercise of any authority in opposition to her rights. She might if she pleased, decline the grant—(Hear, hear!)—and no power would force its acceptance upon her. The Crown had no desire to prove its (Hear!). From the horizonton of this model. sire to press it—(Hear!) From the beginning of this unfortu-nate business, there never had existed in that quarter any wish to inflict pain or injury on this illustrious and unfortunate Ludy. - (Hear, hear!)- Burther Majesty need not be alarmed, as she was evidently mistaken about the nature of this grant. It was the duty of Parliament to place what it thought fit at the disposal of the Crown; but she could only receive it from the King. But here, as in all the rest of her proceedings, she travelled into unconstitutional error—and was trying to erect herself into a great power in the State; and where she was only a subject, it had gone so far as to be common to hear of her subjects.—(Great elamour, cheers, and cries of Hear, hear!)

Mr. Wetherell rose to order. The Learned Gentleman began by explaining something he had said on a former night. (Loud ories of Order! and much confusion.) Mr. Wetherell persevered in being heard, notwithstanding the agitation into which the House was thrown-at length

Mr. Hume also rese to order. It was, he thought, neces-Mr. Hums also rese to order. It was, at the said sary to ascertain if the Noble Lord knew what he did mean, or the meant what he said—(A murmur and cries of order.)

The Speaker instantly interfered. Nothing could be more disorderly than this first sentence of an appeal in favour of

Mr. Hume, to order, said be considered the Noble Lord's attributing to her Najesty a desire to crest herself unconstituattributing to her Majesty a desire to ereas nersen uncessatu-tionally into a power in the State, which he (Mr. Hume) knew she never meant—nad of travelling unconstitutionally into error in the whole of her proceedings, was quite disorderly. He called on the Noble Lord to state his authority.—(Cries of

The Speaker sail, this question was not upon the point of order, and itself a disorder.

Lord Castlereage resumed, had he been allowed to proc without interruption, be thought be would have given the House to understand, that he was not out of order, and that it was perfectly competent to him to offer the observations he had made. It was too much for the Honourable Member under the gallery, (Mr. Hume) to call him to order, even admitting that in the warmth of the moment, he had made use of the expressions referred to, (Hear.) for he had yet to learn that the sovereignty of the Queen was so completely established in this House as to preclude her name being introduced and commented upon by any Hon. Member (Loud cries of hear, hear.) He had not imputed to her Majesty any views or motives without foundation. He had good grounds for every thing he said.

—(Hear, hear.)—At the same time he would readily admit that the Hon. Member was much more in her Majesty's confidence than he (Lord C.) could presend to be. He had not, like the Hon. Member, ever travelled about from place to place, with the literary productions of her Mujesty, in the shape of addresses, (a laugh,) which by the way, seemed to show that the Hon. Member had known something of them before they were put forth in print, and distributed among her Majesty's "affectionate subjects." The House would see many instances in the several afrawers returned by the Queen to the addresses she had received the called the return to the addresses she had received, that she called the people of England her sub-jects. The answer to the Dover address had these words, jects. The answer to the Dover address had these words,—
"I hope the time will come when it will be in my power to promote the interests of my subjects," and in like manner the Queen said she would always consult "the happiness of her subjects, the good people of Canterbury." But in what way mould she consult the happiness of all these her good and would she consult the happiness of all these her good and loving subjects? Why, by subverting the Constitution of the Realm, by destroying every thing that was valuable and revered, in order to bring about that Parliamentary reform which was so much talked of, (repeated cries of hear, hear.) But reverting to the motion before the House, surely they would not suffer themselves to be dictated to by the Queen. It was not for her to make conditions with the House, as to the terms upon which she would consent to receive any money that was to be assigned to her by the liberality of the Crown. The House would see how her Majesty's conduct upon this occasion went from step to step in her endenvours to destroy the Constitution. In the first instance she said she would receive no money from the Ministers of the Crown, and now she refused to accept it from Parliament. He should be glad to retused to accept it from Parliament. He should be glad to know if she would not consent to accept a pecuniary prevision, till she was placed in a royal palace, and had all her rights, as she termed it, granted to her. In short, she was not to acquiesce, for that was the plain English of the matter, till she had the King's authority laid at her feet?—(Cheers.)—But this she should never have, if he could help it. While he had power to act, the feelings of the Monarch should not be outraged, nor should the Royal subsection because the should the should the state of the should th outraged, nor should the Royal authority be openly and daringly invaded—(Hear, hear.)—He well knew the object of the Hon. Gentlemen opposite in opposing this motion, and be was glad he knew it, for he would never bend to them; he would now meet them op nly and fearlessly. It was quite clear that the only object which Hon. Gentlemen on the other side had in view with regard to the present question, was to

The Speaker concurred with the Right Hon. Gentleman, and thought the Noble Lord had made an allusion to the Hon. Member for Essex, which was not perfectly in order.

Lord Castlereagh apologized for having been led into any hasty expressions in the warmth of debate, and proceeded. He had stated on a recent occasion, that His Majesty's Government did not contemplate any new measures against her Majesty, and he thought that ought to have the effect of silencing those who were so clamerous against him and his Honourable Friends. He, however, considered the whole of the proceedings that had occurred, open to the judgment of the House and the country. The Noble Lord concluded some further observations by insisting, that the regular course was, to go into the Committee at once, as the House would thus best evince that respectful duty which the Crown had a right to expect.

Mr. Tierney said, it was quite unparliamentary for the Noble Lord to say of him or his Hon. Friends, that all their acts emanated from a love of power.—(Hear, hear!)—He had not the affectation to say, that he was not ambitious! he felt that he was so, but it was from quite a different feeling to that attributed to him by the Noble Lord. It was natural to seek power, as the only bond of union that could give effect to the principles they professed. He knew of no other bond of union than power. But if the Noble Lord meant to say, that he (Mr. T.) or his Hon. Friends would hold power upon the some terms as the Noble Lord and his friends held it, then he would throw back the imputation in his teeth, and tell him that he would rather die on a dung-hill, than go through some of the work which he had seen performed. Never yet had there been heard of a more unmanly attack on a defenceless woman than that contained in the latter part of the Noble Lord's speech on Friday. The Message and down by the Contained in the latter part of the Noble Lord's speech on Friday. day. The Message sent down by the Queen was not palatable to the Noble Lord. Upon the merits of it, he (Mr. T.) would pronounce no opinion; but this he would say, that had he been the Queen, he would have sent a similar one, under the circumstances. It was said by the Noble Lord, that the professed cumstances. It was said by the Noble Lord, that the professed object of it was, to attack and insult the Crown—quite the contrary. There might, perhaps, have been some colour for the imputation, had the Message been sent after the money was voted; but it was obvious that the object of the Queen was to avoid any remarks of the kind; while, at the same time, she thought to vindicate her honour. The Right Hon. Gent. said, before accepting any provision of a pecuniary nature, she said, "I owe it to myself to declare, that I will not take your money, till you absolve my character." This, he contended, was language every way worthy of a Queen; but then the Noble Lord made a boast of his forbearance, by stating, that no new proceedings were to be instituted against her Majesty. reason was obvious, he knew he dared not institute any. The Right Hon. Gentleman then commented on that part of the Which referred to the provision for the O. and asked, what was there peculiar in the Queen's case, fit for the consideration of Parliament? Or what other knowledge had the House and the country of her Majesty, but that she had been tried, persecuted, and acquitted; and that up to this good hour, she had not received a shilling of the public money. Having descanted at some length on these topics, he said, the Noble Lord might use as many and as high-sounding phrases as he pleased; but the Queen's name would, netwithstanding, be restored to the Liturgy. Let the Noble Lord believe him, and he (Mr. T.) would stake all his credit upon the event. He was convinced, in his own mind, that the people would never give over, until they had obtained the full restitution of her Majesty to all her rights. The omission of her name had caused a ferment which the Noble Lord was bound to allay. He would advise the Noble Lord to set speedily and sincerely about it, and he would suggest to him that the only means of accomplishing the thing, was by proving to the country, that she who had been acquitted, ought and would have the full benefit of that acquittal.

Mr. B. Bathurst vindicated and explained the King's Message; the preliminary part of which be contended, contained a clear recommendation to make provision for the Queen. The Message stated, that her Majesty had not had as yet, any pro-Surely Parliament was the fittest Tribunal to entertain the question of the Queen's allowance. The Noble Lord had properly alluded to the matters in the other House, for they were now become the property of the public. By the second reading of the Bill, the principle of it was adopted, as he conceived. That House and the country must judge of the evi-dence in the other House, without taking into account the judgments of their Lordships. The Queen now stood in the same situation as if she had never been accused. She was not entitled to ask a boon from the Crown.

Lord Folkstone deplored the introduction of this most unhappy proceeding. And, if it appeared objectionable in the beginning, every step which was taken on it subsequently, only made that disgust which he first felt increase. Neither was the Noble Lord's speech to-night calculated to undo the impression: what in fact was the subject or object of the Noble Lord's proposition; could it be said that it was meant for her Majesty's benefit, when in the very speech in which he asked a grant for her, he threw out against her the most bitter sar-casms. The Noble Lord went little short of accusing her Majesty of high treason; and was this language which, at the present moment, ought to go forth to the public? With respect to restoring the Queen's name to the Liturgy, if it was a favour, wose would be the great merit of conceding it? for it would not be a favour to her personally, but a favour to the wishes of the people of Eugland. That it would gratify the people there was not a shadow of doubt; and was a trifing favour too great, when the Ministers of the Crown were asking 50,000l. a-year from the empty pockets of the people? It seemed to be admitted on all hands, that the restoration of her Maiesty's name to the Liturgy was the great object of all the petitions to that House. He then moved, as an amendment, that instead of the Speaker's leaving the Chair, the House should now adjourn.—[Here there was a loud cry of Question. The Gallery was ordered to be cleared; and while strangers were retiring]-

Mr. Browne rose: he denied that the Noble Lord (Castlereagh) had given any opinion respecting the guilt of her Ma-jesty. But be wished to know what the Noble Lord opposite (Folkestone) meant, when he talked of her Majesty's innothe innocence of one against whom a Bill, charging her with adultery, had been read a second time :--who, by such second reading, was virtually declared to be guilty of the highest offence which a Queen Consort could commit. And as it fit that this female should receive and enjoy the same bonours which had been granted to the late virtuous Queen Charlotte? He thought the sum of 50,000l, would be an abundant allowance for a Queen whose character, to say the best of it, was suspected not to be good; and if a smaller sum were proposed, he should vote for it.

fr. Lamb said his wish always was that this business should never be brought forward. As the proceedings against her Majesty had been brought to a conclusion, he must consider her as virtually acquitted, and, therefore, he thought her name ought to be restored to the Liturgy. On these grounds, he also thought, she was entitled to a provision. At the same time he thought it would have been altogether as favourable for her if she had in the first instance accepted the 59,000l. a-year which had been offered to her, before any trial came on. And even at the conclusion of the trial, it would have bean as well if she had given up this point of the Liturgy. And although he would not presume to condemn, he could not help lamenting the Message which her Mujesty had sent down to the House that day. It would be unwise for the House to alter its course in consequence of that Message. In pursuance then of the duty which he owed to, his Country, and with a view of calming the agitated state of the public mind, he should vote for the House going into a Committee.

Mr. Braugham lamented that his Hop. Friend should have made the observations which he had first done. For his own part the fullest conviction rested on his mind, that the Queen was guiltless. If he (Mr. Brougham) had conceived that the Liturgy was a thing of no importance, if he even considered it no more than as dust in the balance of this question, the Nobie Lord opposite would have relieved him from all doubt, by the manner in which he treated the question. At one time the Moble Lord looked on the exclusion of her Majesty's name as a stigma: now he called the abandonment of the Bill of Pains and Penalties a technical acquittal, and would assume that the Bill ought to bend the consciences of that House, although it had never come down there. He never heard any thing more moderate in its tone than the Message sent down to the House by her Mujesty that day. How could such a Message as this be construed into disrespect to the House? He could lay his hand on his heart, and conscientiously declare, that he saw means of terminating these discussions, except by doing justice to her Majesty, on the principle that she who had been acquitted, ought not to be treated as if she were guilty,

Mr. Bright conceived it was the duty of the House to pro ceed immediately to the proposed grant; and he thought the Message of her Majesty this day, was an additional reason why the House should do its duty in voting the proposed sum to the Queen. The Queen had said she would not receive the grant, and that was the reason why the House was bound, in support of its own dignity, to go on. He, for one, would vote a proper allowance, and say—"There it is; if you wish to have it, take it from the Exchaquer: if you will not take it, That was the principle upon which he should vote against the adjournment, as the only means of tranquillizing

Mr. Martin, of Galway, supported the motion for the Speaker leaving the chair.

The motion for the Speaker leaving the chair was then car ried without a division.

The House in a Committee.

Lord Castlireagh rose and said, the only question on which the Committee had then to deliberate was, what should be the proper quantum of allowance to be granted to ker Majesty? He should propose such a provision as he considered suitable to her present situation. In looking at the condition of her Majesty, it appeared to be that of a Queen Consort separated from the King. It was a separation recognized by his late Majesty, the King. It was a separation recognized by his late may say, and one which had been felt by him as inevitable. The provision, therefore, could not be that of a Queen living in the court of the court her husband, and keeping up all the forms of state along with him. If the Queen survived his Majesty, she would be entitled to a dower of fifty thousand pounds a year; therefore he thought the same meome should be THEN IO DET WALL WITH separate from her husband, and which was the same as that proposed to be given to her in 1814. The grounds then on which the House made that division existed at this time. It was on the same principle that a similar offer had been made to her at St. Omer's. It was on these grounds that the present grant was now proposed, and that he should move a resolution that an annual sum of 50,000l. be granted out of the Consolidated Fund to her Majesty, during her Majesty's life.

Mr. Stuart Wortley objected to the grant of so large a sum. He saw great danger in placing so large a sum in her handsof one who and used such unwarrantable language in her answers to various addresses; and particularly in her letter to the King. He defied any manner to say that such sentiments as they contained were not directly calculated to overturn the constitution of the country.

Lord John Russel thought it highly improper to throw out such a charge against her Majesty, after her severe and bitter

Mr. Alderman C. Smith deprecated the Queen's answers to the addresses, the language of which, in his opinion, was highly

Mr. Hume could not, indeed deny, but there might, on close examination be found some individual and detached expressions which to some may appear strong. He well understood the meaning of those cheers on the opposite side, and how unwilling gentlemen on that side were to support any thing that leads to arbitrary power, tyranny and sppression. He did not see that all the sentiments in her Majesty's answers to the addresses were blameable, although he could admit some one or two objectionable expressions. He would contend, however, that honorable member for York had not been able to substantiate his charge; he (Mr. Hume) would maintain these answers contained principles the most constitutional, moral, and religious. He would repeat it, that they contained doctrines of the soundest morality and religion.

Mr. Stuart Wortley insisted that so far from being constitutional, most of her answers to addresses, and particularly her Majesty's letter to the King, were quite seditious.

Mr. H. Sumner should deem it his duty to move on a future day for monies advanced on her Majesty's account, and how He had heard from rymour that she had paid no private bill since she came to this country. Where, then, he would ask, is all the money advanced gone to? If not sent out of the country, as he believed it was for the worst of purposes-it was employed at home to create sedition, agitate the country, and corrupt the press. He proposed an amend-ment to the grant, by substituting instead of 50,000l. that of 30.0001.

Dr. Lushington would not besitate to say, her Majesty would have a better chance in being tried before a jury of felons.—(Cries of Order, Order!)—What was the description of proceedings, he would ask? Nothing could be more repugof proceedings, he would ask? Nothing could be more repug-pant to the Constitution, than Bills of Pains and Penalties. He congratulated the Ministers on their change of mind; be congratulated them on their intention to proceed on a milder ground.

Mr. Alderman Wood begged leave to call the Member for Surry, to point out any one debt her Majesty incurred since her hich has not been paid; all her bills are paid month ly; and have been so, although, for the first quarter she was obliged to live upon credit; and for the last quarter no advances have been made. If the Member for Surry could point out any bill of her Majesty's not paid, and it were sent down, he would see it paid.

ser wished for better authority, than the Hon. Alderman's assertion.

Mr. Brougham rose and said that he and his colleagues were indeed her Majesty's law advisers and responsible Minis-ters; but could not be supposed to have a perfectly accurate knowledge of her expenses and disbursements. He believed the worthy Alderman to possess a correct knowledge on the subject. Had never heard any positive assertion as to her Majesty's bills not being paid punctually once in a month.

After some further conversation, the Motion was agreed to for granting the sum of 50,0001, and at two o'clock in the morning the House adjourned.

THURSDAY.

The Grampound Disfranchisement Bill was read a first time.

Second reading on Monday.

A great number of petitions were presented in favour of the Queen from Edinburgh, Dalkeith, Northampton, and other Mr. Grenfell asked the Right Hop. Gentlemen when the Public might expect the issue of the Bank Notes, the plan of which had been agreed to twelve months since.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, they were not ready on account of the difficulty of obtaining a note calculated to prevent forgery of it.

Sir J. Newport called the attention of the House to a breach of privilege, and a censure upon the deliberations of that House and the liberty of speech, which was one of the peculiar privileges of Parliament, this was recognized by an entry on the Journals of 23d May, 1810. The complaint originated in an Address to the Throne from the Presbytery of Langbolm, in the County of Dumfries, published in the Gazette of the 2d January lust, and stated therein to be received by His Majesty, "tery graciously," but which, in his opinion, was most improper to be presented to the Throne—but he knew that no blame attached to the Throne—that His Majesty was too early brought up in this country, and had been deeply impressed with the principles of the Constitution to feel any disposition to imringe the rights, or to impair the attributes which belonged to this House. The Right Hon. Baronet then read the Address, the objectionable passages were-" We have witnessed with much concern, and we strongly depresate the spirit of disaffection lately become so prevalent, for what we would term the violent and unconstitutional speeches of the opposition in both Houses of Parliament—and the infamous sourrility and misrepresentation of a licentious press.—With every good citizen and loyal subject we reproduce the Address and Petition of the Common meil of the City of London-than which a greater insult could not be offered to Majesty, and which it behoves all who wish well to their King and country publicly to condemn; nor can we refrain from reprehending severely the insolute of certain Members of the Opposition upon the late prorogation of Parliament—for if such conduct in the Representatives of the people pass unnoticed, what may be expected from the people themselves."

The Address having been handed in and read by the Clerk.
The Right Hon. Baronet moved a Resolution.—" That the Address, entitled 'The dutiful and loyal Address of the Presbytery of Langholm, County of Dumfries, 'Inserted in the London Gazette of 2d January last, is a manifest breach of the most essential privileges of this House of Parliament."

Lord Custereagn aumited, that many parts of the Augre were objectionable, and he was the last person to defend the encroachment on the privileges of that House, but while he made this admission, he put it to the Right Hon. Baronet, when ther this was a case which be could press to its extent. Would it be advantageous, amid the multitude of libels on the House and on its Mumbers, with which the press teemed, to take up one insulated example, or by doing so provoke a general proceeding against all who offended, which, if done, would entirely occupy Parliament for many months, and put a stop to all other business; besides his Right Hon. Friend (Mr. B. Batburst) had stated that the Addresses for publication in the Gunette were selected from the whole number presented, by the Noble ! Secretary of State, his relative; but he had further declared that in the present instance the publication had taken place in consequence of an oversight and inadvertency, and that it occasioned regret when it was discovered. If this were to be an example for hringing forward all similar offences, he would pledge himself by to-morrow, to adduce three or four charges from Addresses of another kind, in which the most unjustifiable accusations were lavished upon him and his colleagues, the most unwarrantable motives imputed to them for their Parliamentary conduct, and the most gross imputations upon the House, of corruption, of disregard to the people, and of other crimes. If the Gentlemen opposite required that they should be thus covered, he begged to offer his counter-projet.

After some observations from Mr. Scarlett, Mr. B. Bathurst, and Mr. R. Gordon, Sir J. Newport consented to defer the further consideration until to-morrow, in order that an entry might be framed to put on the Journals, of the opinion of the House on the Address.

Mr. Maberly moved for a variety of Papers shewing the deficiency in the Consolidated Fund from the 5th July 1820, to the 5th January 1821, &c. &c. He regretted that the Sinking Fund should be used for the resources of the year, and asserted that in 28 years there had been a loss in collecting the Revenue to the amount of 18,000,000i.—that the national debt for the last eighteen years had increused on the average 20,000,06012 annually, and that it now reached the enormous amount of 900,000,000l. It was a mere fallacy, he said, to talk of the Stoking Fund being 17,000,000l. its nominal amount, for in fact, it was nothing more than the excess of the Revenue over the Expenditure. He contended there might be a great sav-ing—the expence of collecting it amounted to 81. Is. 9d. per cent.—In Ireland it was 211, per cent.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answer to the observations of the Hon. Gent., said the Revenue of last year fur-nished a considerable surplus. It gave him pleasure to state that all the current expences of the year could be met by the Revenue without any recourse to any New Loan, or any new tax. He trusted that the Country had now arrived at the period when it might bid adjen to the necessity of further Loans and New Taxes. He also wished to state that by accounts from London, Liverpool, and Hull, the increase in the Revenue of Customs for the last half year exceeded that of the former half-year by 3,500,0001. A cheering prospect of the actual improvements of the Country.

mr. Baring, Sir J. Neurport, Mr. Phillips, 4c. made some bservations and the various accounts were ordered.

On bringing up the Report of the Committee on the King's speech relative to making provision for the Queen, Mr. H. Sumner renewed his proposition for substituting the sum of 30,0001. in lien of 50,0001. as the allowance to the Queen. The Hon. Gent. said that the evidence obtained form Mr. Hownam alone was sufficient to satisfy him that the Queen was guilty. This opinion he could not alter, and he did not blink that he acted inconsistently, when he thought that it would not be safe for the Public that so large a sum as that proposed by the Noble Lord should be pieced at the disposal of her Maintein

Mr. Brougham said, the House would see that he could not rise for the purpose of opposing the motion of the Hon. Gentleman; whether the House chose to insert 30,0001., 20,0001., or 10,0001. must be to himself and his Hon. and learned Collongue a matter of perfect indifference. The Queen refused the money entirely. She resolved to take none, and therefore whatever sum the House might think proper to vote was to her Majesty and ker Legal Advisers a matter of perfect indif-

Sir Thomas Lethbridge said they had no right to try the question of the guitt or innocence of the Queen there, but he had a right to express his opinion on the case; and looking at the evidence, he would lay his hand upon his heart, and say he believed her Majesty to be guilty. Neither the taunts of her advocates, nor the clamours of the people out of doors, should deter him from expressing this opinion. He should be sorry to go one step beyond what might be regarded as moderation, but he could not help expressing his sentiments on this question, and as one of the Representatives of the people of England, he would say, that when a grant like that moved by the Noble Lord was proposed, he had a right to support a smeadment that went to substitute a smaller sum. He was question of the guilt or innocence of the Queen there, but he amendment that went to substitute a smaller sum. He was disposed to do this, because he could not approve of the way in which the money placed in those hands had been disposed of. It was said that the Courier Bergami had lately been living in the metapolic of Exposure of the courier for the metapolic of the met in the metropolis of France in a manner which would better fit the rank of our highest Nobility, than a person of his ignoble character. He wished to know, where the fund cama from that supported him in this style of living?—was it from the House of Commons? If they were thus to dispose of the money of the people of this country—if this were submitted to, he knew not what character would be given to the British

Mr. Alderman Wood denied that any money had been transmitted to Pergami. He challenged the Honorable Gentleman to prove that the individual in question lived in Paris in the style He was there by the express desire of her Majesty's legal advisers, in case he should be wanted as a witness in this country. The Alderman denied that the language imputed to her Majesty and been used by her in the answers to addresses, in reference to calling the addressers her subjects.

Lord Lowther rose to say a few words, which went to cor-roborate one of the statements made by the Hon. Member for Somersetshire (Sir T. Letbbridge.) He had been at Paris, and while there, the person pointed out to him as Pergami, was distinguished by an equipage, and a style of living, fully as splendid as any then to be found in Paris. He lived in the most public way, his servants were about every where, and nobody there lived in greater style. Where he got the funds which supported him in this mode of living, and whether he paid for what he had, were circumstances of which he knew nothing.

Mr. Brougham said, it was entirely by his directions, in concert with his colleague and the rest of her Majesty's counsel, that Pergami had been brought to Paris to reside. It was the measurement of the her was forthed from Italy where he was at his suggestion that he was fetched from Italy, where he was residing on his own farm, in case the bill should be brought from the Lords to that House, and in case her Majesty's legal advicers should think it necessary to call him as a witness. This be asserted he knew of his own knowledge.

Lord Castlereagh referred to the printed book, to shew that the statement he had made of the answers to the addresses s correct, when the Alderman challenged him to shew that was correct, when the Alderman challenged him to shew that they were those of the Queen; by proposing them in writing, he knew very well that he (Lord Castlereagh) was not in the service or in the confidence of her Majesty, and he might therefore most gallantly challenge him as he had done, as he must be aware that it was the last challenge that he could possibly accept. In page 73, the answer ran thus: "Though no Queen has been more easy of access to her people, on their part, there has been more diminution of lave and requect. The are of ignohas been not diminution of love and respect. The age of ignorance is passed away, when it was thought indispensable that subjects should be distant and obsequious. A sovereign may dispense with the ceremonal formerly required, (there it would sen the Queen considered herself to be a Sovereign,) could not keep aloof from them without forfeiting their regard."

Mr. Gipps referred to a record of a vote of thanks from that House, thanking Queen Anne for ordering the Electress Sophia (the next in succession) to be prayed for. This proved that it was optional with the Sovereign to regulate the names in the Liturgy, as had it not been so there would have been no thanking the Queen for what she had done.

Mr. Denman, Mr. Wilmot, Sir T. Ackland, Mr. Forbes, Sir F. Ommaney, and Sir F. Blake, made some observations, and the original grant was carried. (Adjourned.)

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Friday evening, Lord Viscount Cranbourne, the only son of the Marquis of Salisbury, led to the Hymeneal altar, the accomplished daughter of Mr. Ramber Gascoyne, in the presence of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury, Counters of Westmeath, Marchioness Dowager of Downshire, the Ladies Hill, Lord Arthur Hill, General and the two Misses Gascoygue, Mr. and Mrs. Evelyn, Mrs. and Miss Stewart, Earl of Clarendon.
The ceremony was performed in the great saloon at Mr. Gascoyne's house, by the Hoa. and Rev. Gerrard Wellesley. The Duke of Wellington gave the Lady away; the Bridesmaids were the Misses Gascoynes, her cousins. The Bride was habited in a superbdress of Valenciennes lace, and looked most lovely. After the ceremony, the happy pair left town for Mr. Daniel Giles's beautiful seat, called Youngsbury, in Heitford-

Daniel Giles's beautiful seat, called Youngsbury, in Heitfordshire, there to pass the honey moon.

Admirers of native talent, and desirous of promoting the interest of the most delightful of sciences, we had great pleasure in attending the first of the Apollonicon concerts for the season, vocal and instrumental, at the rooms of Messrs. Flight and Robson, St. Martin's Lane, on Thursday evening. Mr Adams's extempore playing drew forth warm plaudits from an audience distinguished by its numbers and respectability; and, in Mozart's Overture to Figaro, Hadya's Seventh Grand Symphony, one of Handel's overtures, and two or three other pieces, the powers of that extraordinary instrument, the Apollonicon, were developed, by the skill of five performers at once, in a style of excellence that could scarcely be imagined. Miss Williams's full, clear, and well-harmonized voice was very successful in Rossini's cavatina of Di Piaces; and, in her duet with Mr. Nelson, Crudel perché sinora, that and, in her duet with Mr. Nelson, Crudel perché sinora, that lady's efforts were rewarded by a warm and cordial encore. Shield's glee of Load-stars, sung by Miss Williams, Mr. Goulden, and Mr. Nelson, with great spirit and effect, was also loudly encored; and Mr. Goulden's Comfort ye my People, and Mr. Nelson's Farewell to the Nymphs, experienced a very warm reception. Shakespeare has well observed that—'The man who hath not music in his soul,

Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils,"
The genuine John Bull love of the art, combined with his patriotic feeling, was strikingly displayed, in the ardour with which our grand national anthem of God sars the King was received by the whole audience standing. We rejoice at the prospect that this is becoming a highly popular entertainment.

There has been a great deal of business transacted at the Stock Exchange during the last week, chiefly in consequence of the confidence reposed in the financial departments of Government. The declaration made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Thursday night in the House of Commons, that the Government would not require any Loan this year, nor was it necessary to lay on any new tax, has had the effect of strengthening the confidence which previously prevailed in the Market;
consequently on Friday morning, as soon as the Market opened, the funds rose upwards of a half per cent, and continued upon the rise. It is affirmed by a number of smonied men, that before the account day the funds will reach 75; this occasions much speculating. The following

BULL. JOHN.

LONDON, FEB. 4.

THE Queen (the poor Queen, her Radicals begin to call her) has been extremely damaged in the gales which have blown without interruption, since the meeting of Parliament; "When the winds are high," (said the Grecian Mystic) " worship the Echo." This oracular advice, which has hitherto puzzled the learned world, the Queen's friends have explained and practised; for since the storm begun, they have not dared to make one single effort to save her, but have wisely contented themselves with repeating and re-echoing all the weather-beaten and shipwrecked nonsense, with which the town had been strewed for the previous six months.

Parliament meets; a speech is delivered from the Throne! Innocent and injured as the Queen was, oppressed and degraded as the Majesty of the Throne was said to be in her person, indignant as every English breast was at her wrongs, and endangered as every Englishman's safety was by her oppression; why, why, we ask confidently, was the opposition silent on that most important occasion? Why were they content with such indignation swelling in their hearts, with such charges burning on their tongues, why were they content to sneak in silence after the speech of the Ministers, and again we say, when the "winds were high, to worship the Echo?"

It could be no respect for the King's speech, for Mr. Tierney in the year 1819, did not hesitate à propos des hottes to move an amendment to the address-it couls not be respect for the King's person, for Mr. Denman showed his loyalty and learning on a late occasion, by comparing him with Nero, and Mr. Brougham has called His Majesty and every body else so many things, that no one will suspect him of feeling respect for any body, not even for

Well-we pass over their shirking the address and come to the next stage of their proceedings; Lord Archibald Hamilton gave notice of a motion, which promised to propose the restoration of the Queen's name to the Liturgy: this, at least was bold, and the country expected that the question would now be brought in a tangible shape to a specific point, but nothe Queen's character (though to be sure it is rather a heavy article) was as dust in the balance, when counterpoised by the gossamer hope of the King's favour. Mr. Tierney, like the old serpent, looked upon the frailty of Eve as worth nothing, unless it could lead to the debasement of Adam, and accordingly he summoned his compeers to meet him in the Piccadilly Pandemonium, for the purpose of mitigating the Moloch-like fury of Lord Archibald Hamilton, and substituting for his offensive motion, the plausible, insidious, and self-interested proposition of the Parliamentary Belial.

For a long while, Lord Archibald was like the deaf adder, which "heareth not the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely:"-he is said to have stated in very strong language, with a very weak voice, the ridicule, the disgrace, that would attend such shuffling and calculating; but the obstinacy of the old hounds, and the scent of office which ascended from Downing Street, and regaled the delighted nostrils of the young ones, overcame the objections of Lord Archibald, and although his Sister is the Queen's only female companion, he was obliged to submit to the mortification of leaving the Queen stuck in the mire of her own evidences, and endeavouring to shew, not that she was innocent, not even that she had a right to be restored to her station, but that the Ministers were ill-advised in leaving her out of the Liturgy.

So complete and bare-faced an abandonment of the principle which a man voluntarily had taken up, we do not recollect, and we thought could not be paralleled; but the debate which followed this proposition not only equalled but surpassed it in inconsistency: for it was discovered [rather late to be sure] that the words "ill-advised and inexpedient," would naturally involve the Queen's advocates in the very difficulty they wished to avoid, as a question on the wisdom and expediency of the omission, would obviously lead to a discussion of the grounds on which the omission was made, and of course of the character and conduct of the Queen.

Observe then what follows: the whole question of advisedness and expediency appears to have been abandoned in the debate, and a dry question of legality substituted in its place; and instead of a large and statesman-like view of the whole question, four eternal lawyers, Messrs. Wetherall, Mackintosh, Scarlett and Brougham, laboured from seven in the evening till seven in the morning, to shew that by the strict and imperative words of the law, the Queen, however bad she might have been, whatever might be her guilt. and however flagrant her offences, must necessarily be prayed for ipro facto because she was Queen.

We earnestly solicit the attention of our readers to all this management. The dry question of legality, which excluded all consideration of the Queen's character, formed the sole theme of the debate, while a censure upon the ministers was artfully reserved to be the object of the vote, or in two words, the Queen's character was kept out of view and the ministers places never lost sight of.

The result was such as always attends that lefthanded kind of wisdom commonly called cunning;a few dupes were made, and the ranks of the opposition were swelled by some persons, of whose discernment we think we need say no more than that they were deceived by this clumsy trick, as children and nursery-maids are by the Indian Jugglers; but a commanding, an indignant, and almost unparalleled majority of THRRE HUNDRED AND TEN MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, defeated this series of manauvres. And after the affront of being obliged to shift their motion from their notice, and their debate from their motion, and their votes from their debate, the Queen and her friends were left in the deplorable plight of having made their attacks on every possible bearing of the case, and being defeated upon all.

But this is not the worst—a new opportunity was offered, in which they not only might, but indeed were obliged to bring the Queen's conduct into direct examination. Lord Castlereagh moved on Wednesday night for a committee of supply, in which he intended to propose an allowance for the Queen, no greater than that to which she would have been entitled had she never been Queen,-no greater than that which had been offered to her while she was yet abroad,-no greater than that which had been offered to her since her arrival in England, and which she had been so mischievously and madly advised as to refuse.

Here then, at least, the course of the Opposition was clear. Such an offer was neither more nor less than a repeated insult, it was an assumption of guilt; for no man will presume to say that a virtuous and innocent Queen Consort of England could accept the same stipend that had been offered to a suspected, stigmatized, and separated Princess of Wales.

We are therefore not surprised that Mr. Brougham (who we suppose is her official and responsible adviser,) came down to the relief of the perplexity of his friends with a message from the Queen; the purport of which was, that unless her innocence were solemnly recognized by the restoration of her name to the Liturgy, she could not accept this diminished a pensioner of the Queen's.

Thus the matter was again brought to a point; the two armies were in presence, and in great force: there were four hundred and fifty members in the House, and the Whigs in consonance to the Queen's message, and, for once in their lives, with some degree of consistency, avowed their determination to meet the question in the first instance, and upon its broad principles, by refusing to allow the Speaker to leave the chair, until the previous condition of the restoration of the Liturgy, should be conceded or carried.

High and lofty were the specches which they are reported to have uttered, great the hopes, and triumphant the anticipations which they seem to have expressed; but again we have to exclaim, "Oh lame and impotent conclusion!"

When the question was put from the chair, they shrank again before their victorious opponents, and did not dare to divide upon the very question they themselves had proposed.

This sudden panic may be attributed generally to the visible feeling of the House; but no doubt, it was increased by the very able and honest speech of Mr. William Lamb, and by the judicious observations of Mr. Bright of Bristol: these two gentlemen, although generally voting with the Whigs, could not, on this occasion, strain their consciences to that extent.

Mr. Lamb took a clear and just distinction between a technical and a real acquittal; and reprobated, in high and eloquent language, the mischievous arts by which the Queen was advised to keep up the popular ferment: while Mr. Bright, with plain good sense, exhorted the House to do its duty without any respect to the mode in which the Queen might think proper to receive their determination. "Let us vote her the money," said he, "on such terms as we consider to be just, and then let her take it or leave it, as she may think proper."

The House now got into the Committee, and there Lord Castlereagh proposed the sum which had been offered twelve months ago. Not one voice of all the asserters of the Queen's innocence was raised against the amount;—not one of all those who had before so loudly proclaimed her virtue, was now found to move for a sum which, had she not degraded her high station, she ought undoubtedly to have received; while, on the other hand, several respectable Members, in the most distinct manner, declared their wishes that the sum should be still farther reduced, and grounded those wishes expressly upon the Queen's misconduct.

It was in vain that her Majesty's ablest advocates—Alderman Wood, Mr. Brougham, Mr. Hume, and Dr. Lushington, repelled in debate the accusation of guilt; not one of them ventured to move that increased stipend, which, as we have already said, would have been the clear and undoubted right of an innocent Queen.

The same system of conduct has been possisted in through the week, and after all the big words and mighty professions of the party, Her Majesty remains in statu quo. Mr. J. Smith has, to be sure, given notice of a motion for the restoration of her name to the Liturgy, for Tuesday the 13th instant, and we wait the issue without much apprehension.

Mr. Creevey, it will be seen, amused himself, by dividing the House five times in the Committee of supply, because the naval estimates were not before the House. Mr. Bathurst observed, that this trick was by no means a new one. When that liberal advocate for freedom of discussion, Mr. Bennett, stopped the Right Honourable Gentleman in his remarks on such conduct, by moving that the House should be counted.

Our readers will perceive, that an attempt has been made upon the life of His most Christian Majesty, the King of France. From the restricted state of their press, we are unable to form a just idea of the affair.

We sell Seven Thousand Papers; and it is a small computation to suppose that ten persons read each number: now, of those seventy thousand persons, we do not believe that there is one (except the Whigs, who buy us out of fear, and read us in secret) who does not think that Mr. Holme Sumner's proposition for the reduction of the Queen's annuity ought to have been carried; and that that gentleman has done himself as much honour by the manly expression of his opinion, as other persons have disappointed public expectation by their shilly-shally and cowardly submission to so profligate an enormity as the giving our English money to be lavished on Italian minions and domestic sedition-mongers.

We are credibly informed that Count Vassali is a pensioner of the Queen's. We believe that Countess Oldi, that high-born lady, has not a petticoat but what the Queen gives her. Every body knows the scandalous profusion of Bergami: his two palaces in Paris; his diamond ear-rings; his English chariots; his royal liveries, and the princely equipage of his journeys. It is well known, also, that, with all the clamour against bribed witnesses, Hownam is pensioned by the Queen; and Flynn, if not pensioned, has at least received sums of money from her; add to this, the "Tinkers in Armour," the Glass-blowers, the "Damsels of Marybone,"

"In ten backney coaches," and all the idle and disorderly processions and addresses, which nothing but money could have procured, and then let us ask—whether John Bull is indeed such a dull and stupid beast as to be satisfied to increase his burthens by providing for such profligacy? John Bull indignantly says—No.

BRIGHTON ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN.
A correspondent asks us if we know any thing of the two gent'emen, — Thunder, Esq. and — Slight, Esq. who presented this Address to the Queen.—We are apprehensive that their claim to the rank of Esquires is rather equivocal. Mr. Thunder is a very inferior shoemaker at Brighton, and Mr. Slight an humble staymaker, in North-street, in the same town.

Alderman Wood is made, in the Old Times newspaper, to deny, in Guildhall, that the Queen ever called us HER subjects; and defies any body to prove that she ever has. In her answer to the Canterbury Address, she says, "I shall be happy to do any thing for the good Town [City she would have said] of Canterbury, and to make MY people happy."—In the answer to the Dover Address, she says, "I trust that some period will arrive, when I may be permitted to promote the happiness of MY subjects."—To Wandsworth she says, "No Queen was ever more easy of access to HER subjects than I have been."—Nay, in her letter to Mr. White, the butcher, of Norfolkmarket, Dublin, Lady Anne Hamilton, in acknowledging a piece of beef, which he sent the Queen, says, (speaking of the beef) "her Majesty receives it as a token of that loyalty and attachment so grateful to her feelings, from HER dearly-beloved people of Ireland.—What a stupid Ass this Wood must be, to talk such nonsense.

In one of our early numbers we remarked, that we could shew, that the gentleman calling himself Sir Robert Wilson. is no Knight. This is no matter of difficulty; but it is unpleasant to us, because it unknights two or three very good fellows. Keir, Butler, and Pocklington are all in the same predicament. As young men, in the 15th Dragoons, they made a gallant push, and saved the Emperor of Germany, and were rewarded with a cross and ribband resembling that worn by the Knights of Maria Theresa. The fact that they were never Knights even of that Order, does not bear upon the point we are now discussing; nor could it affect Major-General Wilson, who has subsequently procured half a dozen stars and ribbands; but the truth is, that nobe of these officers were knighted by their own Sovereign; and by the Ordinances of our Government, foreign Orders give no nominal distinction.

ROBERT FELLOWES.

SIR,—I have lately been engaged in perusing a book, which has excited in me the highest admiration of the author's learning and piety, Dr. Magee on the Atonement. In that work, the eminently learned author, besides giving a correct and Scriptural exposition of his subject, has likewise conferred signal service on his younger readers, by pointing out to them the faults of such writers as were most likely, from the beauty of their style, or the boldness and novelty of their notions, to attract attention. Among these is a man of the name of Fellowes—'ROBERT FELLOWES.' Can you inform me, Sir, whether this man is yet in the land of the living? Whether he is suffered by the Bishops of our Church to hold any kind of preferment? or to hold communion at all with the Church? If he is so suffered, it is of little consequence, henceforth, what a man's faith or practice may be, who can contrive by any means to "climb' or "intrude" into the Christian fold. Such preposterous, such blasphemous doctrines as this man has been suffered to usher into the Christian world, would certainly have never been endured if the public mind had not been previously poisoned by the infidel notions of Paine.

been previously poisoned by the infidel notions of Paine.

The Universal Church of Christ, and our Church in particular, contends, that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God;" and that, therefore, we may receive the doctrines contained therein, without fear and without suspicion. But, Mr. Fellowes, with great and laudable modesty, tells us, that of St. Paul and his various "puerile conceits." He (Fellowes) makes no account. The Apostle, he informs us, labours with mysterious meanings, which he fails in developing with sufficient perspicuity. His Epistles, generally, relate to questions, which are at present of more curiosity than importance? "A modern believer has," consequently, "very little concern with any of the Epistles of this Apostle;" or, indeed, with any of the Epistles, all of which this writer finds to be "involved in a ten-fold obscurity;" and to which, he pronounces to be impossible that we could ever pay the smallest attention, but that we "prefer stumbling in darkness"—that we delight more in error than in truth,' &c. &c. &c.

Were it not that such blasphemies might shock your readers, I could give you numerous and still more explicit extracts from the writings, or (if you please ravings) of this man—whose language, Dr. Magee tells us, " is every where that of the bitterest rancour against all who embrace the doctrines which he rejects, and which, in subscribing to the articles of the Church to which he belongs, he bound himself by solemn promise to maintain." Sir, I call upon the Right Reverend the Bishops—I call upon their Graces the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, (the former of whom sanctioned, and very properly, the removal of Mr. Stone for a similar offence) to have diligent search made in their respective Dioceses and Provinces, whether this person be still within the sacred pale of the Church.

If the altar itself is to be polluted by the presence and services of men who glory in their disbelief of every thing that distinguishes that Church from Mahometanism or Paganism, and who reprobate and ridicule the most essential doctrines of Christianity, then, Sir, the downfall of that Church, and of civil and social order cannot be very remote.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

ELEGIAC STANZAS
TO THE EARL OF HAREWOOD.

Harewood! too long mistaken, I am glad Your pompous humbug is at last found out; Fools thought you wise, because you looked so sad; And fancied one so big must needs be stout:

But now we see the value of all that!

Thy little speeches made with mighty pains,
Thy long red walstcoat and thy broad-brimmed hat,
(No Hat in England circles weaker brains.)

Deceive no longer—we have seen you try
To steer 'twixt popularity and jobs,
Touching both shores; and very cheuply buy
The Monarch's favours, and the shouts of mobs.

But Truth at last prevails; and when you chose Your Father's title, conscious Truth took care Your own peculiar merits to expose— Thick as a Wood and timid as a Hare!

And further still, the likeness holds—a Hate.

Squats and sits apright, when no dangers frown;
But, being pressed, she doubles in despair,
And what she late ran up; she now runs down.

And further still the likeness holds—a Wood:
Drinks greedily, when young, the solar ruy;
But when full-grown—ungrateful for the good,
The sullen shade rejects the light of day!

That Title's now thy shame, which was thy boast;
Thine Hare is strangled, and thy Wood is cut;
The Hare with your good leave, we mean to reast,
And use the log of Timber as a but! /

REPLY, BY MR. GRENFELL.

Erskine, at least, is guiltless of my blunder, For ev'ry speech he makes he calls a wonder!

John Bull honestly confesses that he cannot see the point of either of the above epigrams; but as he is unfortunately blind to Whig patriotism, he may possibly be blind to Whig wit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A number of petitious were presented from the Shoemakers of Perth, Coopers of London, Town of Bernard Castle, Liverpool, &c. &c. in favour of the Queon.

Mr. Curteis said he held in his hand a number of the London Gazette, to an advertisement in which he wished to call the attention of the House. It was a notice from Government respecting proposals for a supply of 17,000 bags of American flour for the use of the troops in the West Indies. He would ask why American flour was thus openly preferred to British, to the manifest prejudice of our agriculturists. He would also ask him why the flour from Canada, which was a British colony, should not have a preference of other American flour?

Mr. Robinson said, he had no hesitation in answering the Hon. Member's question. The reason that American flour had been preferred to British, for the West India service, was that the latter had not been found to keep sweet so long as the former. With regard to the advertisement alluded to, he was not ignorant of such a notice having been given in the Gazette; but he had no hesitation in saying, now, that the Board would willingly give the British exporter another experiment, and they had every disposition to give the British grower a pre-

Mr. Curwen stated, that the only difference in the modes of dressing the American and British flour, was, that in the former the corn was dried on a kiln before it was ground.

The document was then laid on the table.

Sir W. Curtis presented a petition from several persons engaged in the foreign timber trade, proying the House to modify the duties on the importation of timber. Laid on the table.

Mr. J. Smith presented the petition of the Merchants, Bankers, and Traders, of the City of London, to the number of upwards of 5000 signatures. It respectfully, but earnestly besought them to take immediate and decisive steps for allaying the ferment at present existing in the public mind—a prayer than which nothing could be more legitimate, and to which he (Mr. Smith) gave his entire concurrence. The petitioners then proceeded to make three or four observations, insisting in the outset, that, in attachment and devotion to the Constitution of this country, they would yield to no set of men, and professing that, their great wish was the maintenance of the institutions of the country. They then gave an opinion, that in a time of severe and trying distress the people were loyal and attached to the constitution; and if instances of a contrary spirit should any where occur, the laws at pre-sent in force were quite sufficient to repress them. But the petitioners did not mean to deny, but that if any necessity existed for the proceeding—if, for instance, the accession to the throne was endangered, the servants of the crown would be justified in paying the penalty of present unpopularity, in order to secure future peace. When, therefore, a public notice was conspicuously affixed, purporting to say, that the Declaration of the "Merchants, Bankers, and Traders of the City of London," was lying open for signatures, the petitioners thought it high time to state publicly what their real opinions were. The spetitioners, therefore, called a public meeting of the Merchants, Bankers, and Traders at the Mansion House. He contended that there was no reason for saying every thing had not been fairly done; for the Lord Mayor did all his power to preserve order.

Sir W. Curtis said, he himself had signed the Loyal Declaration, because it expressed unshaken loyalty to the Constitution and the Monarchy. He strongly felt that it was incumbent on every man in the country who wished well to its best interests, and saw that the preservation of the Monarchy was deeply connected with their interests; it was the duty of all such to come forward and cheer up His Majesty by assurances of attachment to his Throne. With respect to what occurred at the meeting, in the Egyptian Hall, he could only say that he remembered well, that his Hon. Friend (Mr. J. Smith) was heard with great attention; he never knew a man better heard at a public meeting. But it sometimes happened, that when an assembly did not like any part of a speech they would express their disapprobation; and certainly, when the Hon. Gentleman mentioned the name of the Queen, there was much disapprobation expressed. There was, upon the subject of her Majesty much difference of opinion out of doors as well as in that House, and in his opinion. there was even a greater majority unfavourable to her out of doors than there was within. As soon as the Hon. Gentleman finished his speech, in the delivery of which he was heard as well as he could expect, he (Mr. Smith) came forward, and proposed the first resolution, which was carried. He (Sir W. Curtis) then offered himself to the attention of the Meeting, which, he begged to say, consisted of as well-dressed and as good-looking men as he ever seen at a meeting of the kind. The moment however that he attended to kind. The moment, however, that he attempted to speak, there was a tumult raised from a certain quarter of the assembly, and not a word could be heard. He assured that House that he came forward in the Egyptian Hall, as quietly and as temperately as he did at that moment to address the House of Commons. But the assembly would not hear him, and the business of the day was so disturbed by tumult, that it was impossible for any one to be heard. With respect to the petition now presented, the great objection he had to it was, that it not the petition of the meeting from which it professed to emanate Mr. Wells vindicated the characters of those who signed the Loyal Declaration, and stated, that the majority of them were as independent men as as were to be found in the country.

Alderman Wood would assure the House that the presence of the Hon. Baronet was the only cause of the interruption of the good order and tranquillity at the meeting, for he was there a full half hour before the proceedings commenced, and showed himself off at the front of the hustings in great style. Upon the question being put for agreeing to the petition, the show of hands was at least five to one in its favour.

Mr. Basing said, a more unworthy combination or conspiracy for the purpose of suppressing the free and fair expression of opinion was never attempted than that which was carried into effect at the meeting.

Mr. T. Wilson was present at the Meeting in the Egyptian Hall, and he disagreed entirely with the Hon. Gentleman opposite in the statement of what occurred there, as well as with the Hon. Baronet under him. He (Mr. Wilson) remembered to have heard several exclamations from the body of the hall during the speech of that Hon. Gentleman, of "Speak up! we can't hear." Now, he would venture to say, that an occur-Now, he would venture to say, that an occurrence of this sort, at a Meeting so large and impatient as that was, was quite sufficient to produce a strong disposition to

After some further discussions the petition was brought up, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. I. Smith gave notice, that on Tuesday the 13th Feb. he would submit a motion to the House for the restoration of her Majesty's name to the Liturgy.

Sir J. Newport having moved the order of the day, renewed the proposition which he submitted to the House last night, namely, that the Address of the Presbytery of Langholm was a breach of the privileges of that House—which was agreed to.

—He then moved that the following resolution be inserted on the Journal of the House:—"That a communication briving been officially made to the House that the insertion of the afore-said Address in the London Gazette, proceeded from an inudvertence to certain offensive and reprehensible expressions this House does not feel itself called upon to proceed any further thereupon."

On the motion of the Chancellar of the Exchequer, that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of Supply,

Mr. Grenfell rose and said, he felt extremely destrous that some information be laid before the House, as to whether there was any foundation for a report, that the banksrs of Ireland refused to receive the gold coin of the realm in the way of lodge

The Chancellor of the Exchequer professed his ignorance of the matter. He never heard of any Bank refusing to take the legal coin of the country. He was not able to offer any infor-mation on the subject in the absence of his Right Hon. Friend, the Secretary for Ireland.

Sir J. Newport lamented the Right Hon. Gentleman on the other side did not take the trouble of informing himself on the subject, so as to be able to communicate to the House the requisite information.

After some observations from Sir H. Parnell, Mr. Irving, Mr. A. Baring, Mr. Ricardo, &c., the House then resolved itself into a Committee.

Sir G. Warrender moved in the committee, that a navel force of 22,000 seamen, of whom 8000 were to be marines, be kept up for one year from the 1st of January last. He observed, that in consequence of the reductions which had taken place in the foreign stations, the number of 25,000 voted last year, was reduced 1000, saving thereby to the nation 115,000l. Mr. Creevey objected to the motion, until the estimates be laid before the House.

Mr. Hume complained of the disposition of his Majesty's Ministers to encrease the civil and military establishments of the country, and to reduce the naval force, which was the safest and least expensive service.

Sir G. Warrender could not suffer the statement of the Hon, Member, who had just sat down, to pass without a reply; for, if it went forth uncontradicted, it would have the most mischievous effect on the public mind. It was not tirue true that the naval force of the county was neglected. At the close of the war there were 35,000 out-pensioners at Greenwich Hospital; and the First Lord of the Admiralty had evinced his regard for the Navy by voluntarily promoting no less than 1175 Midshipmen.

Mr. Gladstone contended, in the course of some observa-tions, that the Navy was by no means neglected.—He was himself a ship-owner, and he never found any difficulty in procuring seamen.

Dr. Lushington thought in time of extreme necessity, when the safety of the country was threatened, the impressment of seamen might be justifiable; but as we are now at peace with the whole world, some effectual plan ought to be devised to prevent the necessity for compelling seamen to enter the ser-

Sir G. Cockburn said, that a great deal had been done to wards obviating the necessity for the practice complained of. No better plan had yet been discovered than that of giving pensions to sailors, and stipulating for their services wanted.

The Gallery was then cleared, and five divisions took place on the Resolutions, but we could only collect the numbers of three of them, which were as follows:

For the first Resolution, 56—Against it, 11—Majority, 45.
For the second Resolution, 41—Against it, 12—Majority, 29.
For the third Resolution, 43—Against it, 11—Majority, 32.

In consequence of there being only 26 Members present, the House, on the motion of Mr. Bennett, adjourned till Monday.

CONTRASTS .- The Comforts of Human Life, by R. Heron, were written in a prison, under the most distressing circumstances. The Miseries of Human Life, by Beresford, were, on the contrary, composed in a drawing-room, where the au-thor was surrounded by all the good things of this world. A striking contrast will be found to exist between authors and their works; melancholy writers being usually the most jocular in society, and humourists in theory the most lugubrious of animals in practice. Burton, the author of The Anatomy of Me lancholy, was extremely facetious in conversation.

Two works that have lately appeared at Constantinople, afford a very favourable notion of the progress of knowledge in Turkey. One is the first part of a Dictionary in folio, of the Ancient and Modern Greek; the other is an elegant translation into Modern Greek, of Voltaire's Romance of "Zadig" The former, when complete, will consist of six volumes folio. It is printed under the superintendance of that virtuous patriarch, gory, and is patronized by all the Archbishops and Bishops Greece. The editor is M. Iskenteri, who has already translated into the same language, the Voyages of Antenor.

At the late sale of Mr. Kemble's Library, a fine collection of old plays, the most complete that has yet been made, was purchased by the Duke of Devonshire for 2,000 guineas. TO JOHN BULL

SIR.—As you are in the habit of asking questions, I beg to transmit the following one, for the purpose of your putting it to Mr. Brougham.

Does Mr. Brougham recollect concluding a note, written just before his last visit to St. Omer's, with the following words?—" At all events we must keep THAT DEVIL from crossing the water to us."

And if you are so fortunate as to receive an answer tothis question, will you have the goodness further to enquire for me-"Wilo was meant by THAT DEVIL?"

Your constant reader, Old Slaughter's Coffee-House. CURIOSES.

TO JOHN BULL.

SIR,—As there has been a good deal of discussion about the figures of Adam and Eve, to which the Queen shewed an extraordinary addiction—and as many sober, straight-forward going people disbelieve the story of her Majesty's conduct touching Adam, may I be permitted to say a word on the subject.

The details of the whole affair are so masty, that I should decidedly have joined in doubting its authenticity; but I happen to know, that her Majesty had in her possession, at Blackheath, two large Chinese figures, the one male, and the other female, the construction and properties of which, I cannot here describe; that they were filthy and abominable, in the very strongest senses of the words, I aver; and I call upon a person to corroborate my assertion, little likely to favour ill reports against the mistress by whom he is pensioned. - I mean M. Sicard, now resident at Kensington.

Lest M. Sicard should be induced to flounder, and get himself into a scrape about these brutal objects, I will just observe, that he cannot fail to recollect his having shewn the filthy automatons in all the perfection of their bestiality, to various individuals who visited the Queen's house at Blackheath.—I am, Sir, yours, VERITAS.

THE QUEEN'S UNIMPEACHABLE LIFE.

The Old Times of Monday, speaking of the charges brought against the Queen, observes, that they " are picked out of three years of a life otherwise unimpeach-

Let us examine the truth of this assertion.

In the year 1806, the Queen's conduct became so extracrdinary as to call for enquiry, and His late Majesty thought fit to cause a Commission to issue to certain Lords to enquire into the serious ALLEGATIONS made against her.

Under this authority the Commissioners to whom it was directed proceeded to examine witnesses touching the delivery of the 2neen of a male child, with which she was charged; and further to obtain information respecting her Majesty's behaviour towards

Sir Sidney Smith,

Captain Manby, Lord Hood (the present), Sir Thomas Lawrence,

Captain Chester, &c. &c. &c. And the report of the Commissioners, of whom the first and citief was Thomas Lord Erskine, here follows:

"Besides the allegations of the pregnancy and delivery of the Princess, those declarations on the whole of which your Majesty has been pleased to command us to inquire and re-port, contain, as we have already remarked, other particulars respecting the conduct of Her Royal Highness, such as much (especially considering her exulted rank and station) NECES-SARILY GIVE OCCASION TO VERY UNFAVOURABLE INTER-PRETATIONS.

"From the various depositions and proofs annexed to this report, particularly from the examinations of Robert Bidgood, William Cole, Frances Lloyd and Mrs. Liste, your Disjecty will perceive that SEVERAL STEONG CIRCUMSTANCES OF THIS DESCRIPTION HAVE BEEN POSPTIVELY SWORN to by the witnesses, who cannot in our judgment be suspected of any unfavourable bias, and whose VERACITY IN THIS RESPECT WE HAVE SEEN NO GROUND TO QUESTION.

"On the precise bearing and effect of the facts thus appearing, it is not for us to decide: these we submit to your Majesty's wisdom; but we conceive it to be our duty to report on this part of the anquiry as distinctly as on the former facts, that as on the one hand the facts of preguancy and delivery are to our minds satisfactorily disproved, so, on the other hand, we think, that the circumstances to which we now refer, particularly those stated to have pussed between her Royal Highness and Captain Manby, MUST BE CREDITED until they shall reend Captule admir, and is as caspital until tary shall re-ceive some decisive contradiction, And Is tare, are justly entitled to the most seriors consideration."

This report is signed

ERSKINE, SPENCER GRENVILLE

ļ

ELLENBOROUGH. July 14, 1806.

Upon this report, and a Cabinet minute of the Whic Ministers, dated Jan. 25, 1807, His late Majesty grounded a LETTER OF ADMONITION to the Princess, dated "Windsor, Jan. 28, 1807," of which the following is an extract.

" In those examinations, AND EVEN IN THE ANSWER DRAWN IN THE NAME OF THE PRINCESS by her legal advisers, there have appeared circumstances of conduct on the part of the Princess, which His Majesty never could regard BUT WITH SERIOUS CONCERN. And His MAJESTY cannot, therefore, forbear to express his desire and expectation that such a conduct MAY IN FUTURE be observed by the Princess as may fally justify those marks of paternal regard and affection which the King always wishes to shew to every part of his Royal Family."

Here we have her Majesty's unimpeached life before us up to 1807.

From 1807, let us trace her till her departure in 1814. In the course of these seven years, her Majesty honoured Lord Henry Fitzgerald, and young Mr. Sapio, and several other persons with most extraordinary intimacy; the laundry at Bayswater was hired, and many of those pleasant hoaxes were played off, for which her Majesty is so celebrated. In the winter of 1812, it will be recollected, that in consequence of the alleged IMPROPRIE-TIES IN THE CONDUCT of the Queen regarding her daughter, some restraints were imposed on the inter-Course between her Majesty and her child.

On the 24th February, 1813, a report was made by twenty-one Privy Councillors, including, the Archbishop of Canterbury, THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Chief Justice, Master of the Rolls, Judges of the Prerogative and Admiralty, and Speaker of the Commons, stating, "THAT UNDER ALL THE CIR-CUMSTANCES OF THE CASE, WITH A VIEW TO THE WELFARE of the Princess Charlotte, and the MOST IMPORTANT INTERESTS OF THE STATE! THE INTER-COURSE BETWEEN THE PRINCESS OF WALES AND THE PRINCESS CHARLOTTE should continue to BE SUBJECT TO BESTRAINT!

The 24th of August of the same year, is the date of the bond, purporting to be given to the Queen by her brother for £15,000, on which subject, a bill in Chancery has been for several years filed. We need trace her no farther than this, for early in October 1814, she hired Bartolomeo Pergami.

It may, however, be right to observe, that on March 13, 1818, Count Munster made oath, that he believed the bond before alluded to, NOT to be of the Duke's handsoriting or style of composition!!!

And so much for the UNIMPEACHABLE LIFE OF QUEEN CAROLINE.

MISCELLANEOUS.

We feel it our duty to call the particular attention of our readers to an important, beautiful, and very curious work, which was advertised in our proceding publication: The Liturgy of our National Church in Eight Languages, in the same volume, all being seen at one view on every opening of the volume. The languages are, German, Spanish, Latin, and Greek, on the right, and English, French, Modern Greek, and Italian, on the left page.—Mr. Baostha must have been at a very great expence, and have bestowed years of attention, to produce such a valuable and singular work; and as we consider it admirably adapted to assist devotion and education at. the same time, and st engthen social order, by giving a new impulse to that "form of sound words," we hope, and are persuaded, that he will find particular encouragement from the Clergy, and by every family of liberal education. It will also enable foreigners more properly to appreciate our excel-lent Liturgy. The work is dedicated to the Archbishop of lent Liturgy.

The King's accession to the Throne was celebrated on Mondny, at the Sussex Tavern, in Bouverie Street. John Jefferson, Esq. President, Mr. George Rowe, Vice President. Many loyal and constitutional toasts were given: the dinner and wines were excellent, and the company separated at a late hour.

MILITARY GOVERNMENT .- The present government is said to be one of force! Now, let a present fact answer this. In England there are forty counties. In twenty-three of these there are no troops. The seventeen counties which have troops contain two palaces, seven arsenals, and the metropolis. We understand also, that there are not 500 troops in the twelve Welch counties.— Birmingham Chronicle.

Subscriptions have been opened for a public monument in honour of George III. to consist of a statue of his Majesty, in a car drawn by four horses, &c. to be erected in some conspicuous part of the Metropolis. The Royal Family and Archbishops, and the chief of the Nobility, are patronizers and members of the Committee for conducting the same.

Monday being the anniversary of His Majesty's Accession to the Throne, the morning was ushered in by ringing of bells, and the display of flags on the different steeples of the parish churches. The Royal Standard was hoisted at the Tower, and the ships on the River Thames displayed the colours of their several nations. At one o'clock the Park and Tower guns were fired. The In-pensioners of Greenwich and Chelsea were entertained at dinner with boiled pork and pudding, after which each man received two quarts of ale to drink the King's health.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—On Tuesday the Court proceeded to the consideration of the Petition of Mr. Gibbons, against the return of Mr. Woodward, as a Common Councilman, for the Ward of Walbrook, on the ground of his ineligibility upon the words in the precept, and coming within the meaning of an order of the Court of the 12th of Dec. 1676, requiring the Aldermen to give notice to their wardmote, not to elect any person who had compounded with his creditors.

Mr. Gibbons was heard at considerable length in support of his petition, and examined sundry witnesses to prove its allegations.

Mr. Bolland, attending on the part of Mr. Woodward, addressed the Court, contending that they had not the power to pass the Order in question, nor to narrow the rights of the Electors. All Parties then withdrew, and the Court proceeded to consider the several circumstances, and finally dismissed the petition.

stances, and finally dismissed the petition.

On Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the destination and times of the following ships were thus altered, viz.:—Thomas Grenville, Capt. W. Manning; and Marquis of Wellington, Capt. J. Wood, from Bengal direct, to Madras and Bengal, to be affoat the 19th of March, to sail to Gravesend the 31st of March, stay there thirty days, and be in the Downs the 8th of May. Rose, Capt. T. M'Taggart; and Princess Charlotte of Wales, Capt. C. Biden, from China, to Bengal direct, to be affoat the 17th of May, to sail to Gravesend the 31st of May, stay there thirty days, and be in the Downs the 6th of July.

The Magistrates of Essex have determined to erect a spacious Penitentiary for that county, in which all the prisoners are to be classed; and those who are able, obliged to work for their own support, whilst imprisoned. BANK-NOTES.—It seems not generally understood that, to trace a lost Bank note, its date, as well as its number, should be known.

Extraordinary Circumstance in Natural History.— About the end of last October, a pair of martins were seen busily employed carrying ants (the formica hirundinacea of Linnæus) to their young; so plentiful was the supply, that numerous ants remained unconsumed, and took possession of the nest, which, on the departure of the birds, they converted into a complete formicatory. The ants have increased greatly, and their assiduous labours may now be witnessed under the side of the Abbey of Vale Crucis.

THE KING.—On Monday, a very elegant dinner to commemorate the happy Accession of his present Majesty, Jing George the Fourth, having been announced to be holden at the City of London Tavern.—The company that assembled was equally numerous and respectable. The cloth removed, "Non nobis Domine" was sung; after which-

Sir William Curtis (the Chairman of the day), after an appropriately animated and loyal address to the Meeting, in which he set forth the importance of those who loved their country, proving their attachment to their King, gave as the first toast, "The King, with four times -The toast was drank with thunders of applause, which was repeatedly renewed from all parts of the room.

"God save the King," was then sung.

"The Royal Family," and "The memory of our late memorable King," were the next toasts.

The following toasts were then drank:—"The glorious Constitution," with three times three.—"The two houses of Parliament—may they continue honest in their judgment, and firm in their resolves."—"The Duke of York and the Army," with three times three.—"The Duke of Clarence and the Navy."—This was followed by "Old England, and those who do not like it may leave it." Navy."—This was followed do not like it may leave it."

The chairman then called upon the meeting to remember the place in which they met, and proposed—"Prosperity to the City of London and its trade."

The Chairman then, adverting to the circumstances of the times, set forth the important duties which devolved upon the magistrates, and concluded by giving "The Lord Mayor, and the magistracy of the City of London."

The "Health of the Lord Mayor of the City of Dublin" was next proposed with threes time three.

The Lord Mayor of Dublin declared, that any words at his command were quite inadequate to express the gratitade he felt for the honour he had just received. He was proud at being at the head of a Corporation which had been distinguished like that of Dublin, by attachment to its King. He hoped the two corporations of London and Dublin would ever go hand in hand in loyalty, and concluded by proposing the health of their dignified chair-

Sir W. Curtis returned thanks.

"The M. P.'s who have honoured us with their company this day," and "Mr. Wilson, the City Member," were the next toasts.

Mr. Wilson returned thanks, and expressed his determination ever to remain faithful to his duty, and attentive to the interests of his constituents.

Sir W. Curtin then gave a toast, which he thought would meet with the approbation of all present;—"The Earl of Liverpool and his colleagues in office." This toast was drank with three times three, and the Chairman then gave "Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, the pride of England, and the terror of its enemies.

The Chairman said, no man could be more sincerely a friend to the liberty of the press than he was. It must, however, be felt that there were bounds beyond which liberty of the press ought not to trespasss. Every one who knew the present situation of the country must feel that those bounds had been long exceeded. He con-cluded by giving "The Liberty of the Press without licentiousness.

After drinking the health of the Stewards of the day, and several patriotic toasts, the company separated at a

An article from Petersburgh announces that the town of Zamose has been purchased by the Polish Government, for the purpose of being converted into a fortress.

By recent accounts from Canada to the 30th of November, it appears that 11,239 settlers arrived out in the course of the present year.

PARISIAN FACHIOMS.—The Ladies all dressed in grey, with their grey pelisses, grey robes, grey riding-habits, appeared like the 35th edition of Mary Stuart revived. Now to relieve the monotony, pink is the reigning colour; the dress bonnets are copiously ornamented with pink gauze; black velvet hats, with pink feathers, are much in vogue. The dresses this year were too heavy for trimmings of gauze, satin is more worn. The head-dresses are more simple and becoming than they have been; the bair is now more braided and banded, and not with such volumes of curls in front.

The Duke of Manchester, on the lath Dec. met with serious accident by being thrown out of his curricle, his skull was fractured, and he was otherwise much wounded, a piece of his skull covered with blood about the size of half a dollar was picked up near the spot. We are happy to say, that his ultimate recovery is expected.

Baighton.-His Majesty took his usual promenade on Wednesday, on the Palace grounds, and appeared in charming health and spirits. His Majesty, it is said, intends inspecting in person the brave 85th, stationed here, but on what particular day has not yet been mentioned.

Prince Esterbany, in his progress to this place last night, met with an unpleasant accident—his carriage, owing to the breaking of one of the axletrees, was overturned within about two miles of Crawley; but no serious injury happened.

The Anniversary of the King's Accession to the Throne was celebrated here on Monday, in a most splendid style, Sir Matthew Tierney in the Chair.

Briston, Jan. 30.—The anniversary of our Gracious Monarch's accession to the Throne was kept here yesterday, in a style most gratifying to every loyal heart. In addition to the profusion of colours displayed from the shipping in the harbour, the churches, and public edifices, several individuals had handsome "True Blue" flags waving from their houses. Upwards of seventy gentlemen of the first respectability dined together at the White Lion; and many other parties in the different parishes celebrated the day in the same manner; the bells rang merry peals the whole day; and at the theatre a Loyal Address was spoken by one of the players, to an overflowing house.

CANTERBURY .- Charles Henry Later and Thomas Harvey the two presons who were apprehended in this city, for passing a forged 51. Bank of England note to Mr. Miller, a watch-maker of Dover, in the purchase of a silver snuff-box, have been re-examined, and fully committed for trial (under a recent Act of Parliameet to remedy certain inconveniences in local and and exclusive jurisdiction) to the Assizes at Maidstone.

CHESTER.—At our Sessions Balph Booth and W. Rigby, were convicted of a robbery, and sentenced to be transported On the sentence being pronounced, they damned the Magistrates, and exclaimed "they had done their worst." In this this they were mistaken: for they were immediately whipped, having forty lashes each, in a cart, in the Castle-yard, by the hangman.

DUBLIN. -We understand that a number of most respectable Gentlemen, who are not in any respect party men, had a meeting at Morrison's, on Saturday, when an Address was drawn up and approved of, to be presented to His Majesty; having for its sole object and prayer, that His Majesty would sometime deign to favour this country with his presence.

EDINBURGH.—The body of a man was lately found in a ditch at Lechwinnoch, quite naked, there were several severe wounds about the head, the jaw bone was broken, one of the eyes knocked out and the nose flattened, and a stab in the breast. It was nearly covered with earth and bramble bushes. There is no doubt from the man being a powerful one, that he made a great resistance.

EXETER.—An investigation of the numerous records of our City has lately taken place. These valuable articles of anti-quity have long remained deposited in old chests, in a private apartment of the Guildhall, almost neglected. Upwards of apartment of the Guildhall, almost neglected. Upwards of 100 manuscripts have already been discovered and examined by the Rev. George Oliver, Pitman Jones, Esq. &c.: many of them are beautifully written on fine vellum, and present some curious and interesting historical occurrences. The earliest curious and interesting historical occurrences. The earliest yet found is of the time of King Wm. Rufus, 1090, being about the period that Osbertus, the Norman, was Bishop of Exeter; and it is thought some earlier manuscripts may still be dis-

GALMOY .- The circumstances of Brophy's murder, in the parish of Eirke, and Galmoy barony, have not, we believe, escaped the recollection of our renders. A person who had been in Brophy's service was dispatched to market here by Patrick Whelan, of the above-mentioned parish, in care of wheat, on Saturday last: and when returning, in company with several others, was met by a body of men, at Fartagh bridge, at so early an hour as seven o'clock. The ruffians having or-dered his companions to proceed, under pretence of business with him, commanded the latter to kneel and instantly to pre-pare for death. While in that posture, the sanguinary miscreants fired at and killed the unfortunate man!

GLOUCESTER .- At our Quarter Sessions last week, a stonemason and his wife, were sentenced to seven years trans-portation, for obtaining money from the Overseers of Clifton, under a false pretence that the husband was ill and incapable of work, he being at the same time employed, and receiving wages, in his business, as a mason.

INVERNESS.— It is with regret we mention the loss of a fishing-boat off Heimsdale, on Tuesday se'night, with a crew of seven men, who we lament to say all perished. The boat belonged to Brora, and had gone out in the morning in company with another bout; on their return in the evening they were overtaken by a squall,—the one got into the harbour of Helms dale, the other was seen no more. The seven men have all left wives and families.

KILERANY.—On Sumlay between the hours of twelve and one o'clock, an outrage of the most audaeious character was committed in the vicinity of this city. Four armed men, wholly undisguised, entered the house of Capt. Wheeler, of the Rock, who was then in Church, and possessed themselves of a double-barrelled gun, the only fire-arms the house contained. Capt. Wheeler's aunt behaved on this occasion, with an heroism unusual to her sex and age. She caught one of the miscreauts by the breast, and the servant-maid struck another of the party with such violence that blood flowed from his lips. The fellow with great non chalance and good humour put his hand to the wounded spot, exclaiming. " see what you have

LEICESTER.—The Loyal declaration, which was signed by nearly every gentlemen of property and consequence in our county, and which contained upwards of 8000 signatures, has been transmitted to the Secretary of State's office; to which an answer has been given, announcing the same to have been most graciously received by his Majesty.

LIVERPOOL.—The whole of the extensive premises of the Caxton printing-office, in this town, were entirely destroyed by fire, early in the morning of Tuesday last. The loss sustained by the proprietor, amounts to several thousand pounds.

Ross.—We regret to state that the diabolical outrages which have so long disgraced that part of the country are still continued. Fire has been set to the heath in a young plantation, the property of David Dick, E.q. of Glenshiel, which com-municating with the larch, great part of it has been con-

WINDSOR.—The mansion of John Penn, Esq. at Stoke Park was on the night of the 9th, or early in the morning of the 10th instant, burgiariously entered. The villains made their way from the Park into the superb library, by cutting the shutters and removing the fastenings. The value of the property seized and carried off was between 70l. and 80l.; and amongst the articles were a silver gilt inkstand, and another of silver, bearing the family crest; the former valuable, from its autiquity as well as weight, being an heir-loom.

LONDON MARKETS

We have had but few fresh arrivals of Wheat since Monday, but a considerable part of that day's supply remained over to-day; for which the sale was very limited and rather lower. Barley, Beans, and Pease, meet a dull sale, though with little variation in value: and the Ont trade is heavy, though the arrival this week has been moderate, but we do not conrider it lower .- In other articles we have no alteration to notice.

The general outline of this work consists of a History of Parga, and of its Inhabitants, down to the present day; comprising full and minute particulars of the Ceasion of that place to Ali Pasha, and of the pecuniary transactions asconganying it; together with an Account of that Tyrant's Fall, and of the causes by which it was effected. The work also contains an interesting view of the state of the Ionian Islands, under their present constitutional Government: a Reply to the Article in the 46th Number of the Quarterly Review, and an Examination of Sir Thomas Matthand's Diapatch to Barl Batkurst, on the same subject. And to this is subjoined a full and accurate Report of the Trial instituted by the Author against Lieut-General Sir Thomas Maittand, in the Court of King's Bench, in which the latter was convicted of "Unlawfully, wrongfully, and maliciously," issuing a General Order affecting him. The Author presided for several years at the head of the Governments of some of the Ionian Islands, and was also Commandant and Civil Governor of Parga, immediately prior to the Cession. He is already known to the literary world as the Author of a valuable Essay on the Coims of Ithaca and Ceshalonia.

By JEHOSHAPHAT ASPIN.

RCF To record the numes and deeds of the worthles by whose valuar these glories were obtained, is the object of the present work; which contains a notice, and in most cases a detailed account, of every important action, by sea and land, during the reign of George the Third. To the professed historian it will be a useful book of reference, the most charful attention having been paid to dates and places. To the cursary reades, it will prove an entertaining and instructive companion; and to the rising youth, it will be an assuming introduction to the knowledge of the times in which he lives. Nor let the sefter sax shrisk from the perment offs work pub cleasedly exhibiting the rude front of war; but let them read the exploits, and venerate the character, of the heroes who have fought for, security; and let the patriotic flame be by them reflected upon their husbands, shidten, and friends, that when their country's cause may again call for support, a new race, submated by former example, may be found ready to eminist their transcondent merit.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF-LORDS.

MONDAY.
Several petitions were presented in favour of the Queen. Earl Grey presented a petition from the manufacturers, traders, and inhabitants of the town of Birmingham, complaining of the want of trude, and stating the distressed state of the majority of the workmen. A Committee had been formed last year to inquire into the nature and extent of that distress. The Report stated in substance, that a general falling off in the con-sumption of provisions had taken place, from the inability of the workmen to purchase, and that even what they did pur-chase, was furnished on credit. That these persons, accustomed formerly to buy joints of ment, were now constrained to pur-chase morsels, such as neats livers, and two-penny worth or threepennyworths of meats. With respect to the staple trade of the town, the depreciation in iron articles was from 15 to 20 per cent. and every other branch of manufacture felt an equal depreciation.

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the King's Speech had admitted distinctly that distress pressed on a great portion of the people, and he lamented that the fact was so. The Committee to inquire into the state of the Foreign Trade would be revived, and then the subject would be brought under consideration.

After some observations from the Marquis of Lansdowne and Lord Calthorpe, the petition was laid on the table.

TUESDAY.

Mr. Mason presented accounts of the allowances granted to the officers of the East India Company, during the last year.

WEDNESDAY.

The Lord Chancellor sut set of colock in the morning to hear Appeals.—Judgment was confirmed in the case of "Whatley v. Whalley," in which an Appeal had been made from the decision of the late Master of the Rolls. THURSDAY.

Earl Grey gave notice, that on Monday he should move for certain documents connected with the Congress at Troppau, particularly the circular addressed to Foreign Governments— he wished to know the time and date of all communications to other powers.

The Earl of Liverpool would be prepared on Monday to enter into a full explanation on the subject, and to supply any information in his power.

In answer to a question from Lord Holland, Lord Liverpool said, the British Government had not been party to any treaty signed between Austria and Naples, bearing date the 12th of August, 1815.

Petitions from Edinburgh and other places were presented On the motion of Lord Calthorpe, a return of convictions in Courts of Justice was ordered to be presented from 1814 to The Noble Lord intending to bring the subject of the the country.

Petitions were presented from Leicester and other places, in favour of the Queen.

On the motion of Lord J. Russell, the Bill for disfranchising the Borough of Grampound was read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

In answer to a question from Mr. Gooch, whether it was the intention of Ministers to bring forward any motion tending to relieve the Distresses of the Agricultural Interest—

Lord Castlereagh replied in the negative; he had no objec-tion to a Committee of Inquiry, but he saw no hope of providing a remedy for the evils.

Mr. Gooch then said, he should bring the subject under the consideration of the House.

The Marquis of Tavistock took a review of the conduct of Ministers in the late proceedings against the Queen, and went over the history of the green bag, the striking her name out of the Liturgy, and imputed to Ministers a love of office. He protested against the principle of the Noble Lord who talked of technicalities, and affirmed that he had a right to act in respect to the Queen as if the Bill had passed. He then moved that the House come to the following Resolution:—"That it is the opinion of this House, that His Majesty's Ministers, in advising the measure which led to the late proceedings against the Queen, were not justified by any political expediency: and that their conduct has been productive of consequences derogatory from the dignity of the Course, and injurious to the best interest of the dignity of the Crown, and injurious to the best interests of

Mr. Bathurst bore testimony to the manly way in which the Noble Lord and the Hon. Gentleman opposite had stated their views to the House. It seemed to be avawed that the object in view was to procure the removal of His Majesty's present servants, and to obtain, as the necessary consequences of their removal, a Reform in Parliament. The Right Hon. Gentleman concluded with calling upon the House, if Ministers appeared to have been actuated by no feelings of private interest:-if, looking at the whole tenor of their conduct, the House was not disposed to attribute to it improper motives, then it was impossible that it could in honour and in honesty, consent to pass that censure which it was the object of the present motion to convey.

Mr. Whitmore entered into an examination of the question whether the necessity existed for the late proceeding by Bill of Pains and Penalties, and declared that no necessity really existed. The Hon. Member referred to the opinions of Sir William Temple, delivered upon the case of Sir J. Fenwick, in support of his argument against the adoption of the Bill of Pains and Penalties.

Mr. Bankesregretted, that the House and the country should be occupied by the subject of that debate, at a time when so much important business remained upon their hands, and called for their most serious consideration. There was the whole system of domestic policy; the weight of debt; the disastrous pressure upon our most material sources of national prosperity, and most particularly upon the agricultural interests; the troubled state of the South of Europe, and the alarming symptoms which it held out. The Hon. Geutleman, in commenting upon the nego-tiations with the Queen's friends, observed, that it appeared to him (Mr. Bankes) that Ministers did all in their power to avert the evil of her Majesty's coming to this country. And he would ask the House if the greatest evils had not been the consequence of coming to it?

Sir J. Macintosh was of opinion, the expunging of her Majesty's name from the Liturgy, was a high crime and misde-meanour; without saying any thing of the Bill of Pains and Penalties, but because his objections lay deeper to all the proceedings against the Queen. These proceedings, he asserted, had aggravated all the evils and dangers of the country; Ministers, by instituting them, had shewn a disregard of these things: by going on with them they had added to the offence, and the House would be driving matters to the utmost, if they did not pass this vote of censure to-night.

Mr. Peel observed, that he was one who did not concur with Government in the measure of omitting the Queen's name from the Liturgy, and on these grounds, that there was no inconsis tency in coatinuing it, and at the same time coming boldly forward with the charges which were to be made against her. He approved of the proceedings which Ministers had instituted against her. In the course of his experience, there never was a case more imperative; for it was impossible to allow the Queen, labouring under such charges as she did, to mount the throne without making a communication to Parliament.

Lords Nugent and Milton supported the motion.

Mr H. Twiss, in a long speech, which was rendered nearly inaudible by coughings and other noises, opposed the motion. The debate was adjourned till one o'clock the next day. TUESDAY.

A Petition was presented by Sir F. Blake from Mr. Dodd, A Petition was presented by Ser F. Shake from all. 2018.

Calling the attention of the House to the present state of London Bridge, which, if suffered to continue, would be injurious to the commerce of the River.—The petition was laid on the

Mr. Freemantle moved the appointment of a Select Committee, to inquire into the Supply of Water to the Metropolis, and the laws relating thereto. The Hon. Member complained of the impositions practised by the Water Companies, by an increased rate of charges, and the object of the motion was to devise measures to give relief.

Mr H. Summer confirmed the statement.

Mr. M. A. Taylor, Mr. Ald. Bridges, and Mr. Wilmot, wished justice done to the Water Companies. — The motion was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. Wallace, a Committee was appointed to inquire into the state of the Foreign Trade and Commerce of the Country, with a view to remove the impediments so as to give relief to the manufacturer.

Mr. W. Smith moved for copies of all communications between foreign Governments and this Country in respect to the Slave Trade .- Ordered.

The House then resumed the adjourned debate on the motion for censuring Ministers.

Major-Gen. Wilson addressed the House. It was his object to show that his Majesty's Ministers had committed great errors ; and whether they were errors of incapacity or errors of ignorance, they ought to be visited with the same penalties as if they were real offences. For those who undertook such situations must take with them all their responsibilities. He objected to a Bill of Puins and Penalties, and knew of but one ase in which it ought to have received the sanction of the Legislature.

Mr. Huskisson replied to the observations of the former Speakers, and proceeded to notice the conduct of her Majesty on her late journey to the Continent, observing, that if she really innocent, no conduct could have been adopted so calculated to excite suspicion. The Hon. Gentleman particularly dwelt upon the advancement of Bergami under very mysterious circumstances, and the secresy which was observed respecting hims. Mr. H. then alluded to the reports which had given rise to the Milan Commission; and contended, that not to take notice of her Majesty's conduct, would be to disregard the best interests of the State. He concluded with opposing the motion.

Mr. Bennett declared, that however humbly be might think of himself, he considered that he should abandon his duty, if be did not express his condemnation of the conduct of his Ma-jesty's Ministers; and that if he were to share in the ruin, which their measures were calculated to bring upon the coun try, he should have the consolation of knowing that he had entered his solemn protest against those measures.

Mr. W. Pole contended, that there was scarcely one of the efficient acts of administration for the last ten years, which the Hon. Gentlemen opposite to him had not opposed, and for which they would have been quite as ready to pass a vote of censure upon Ministers as they were upon the present occasion. It was important that the House should bear this in mind, bewhen Gentlemen so loudly exclaimed that the conduct of Ministers for the last six months deserved all the censure it was now endeavoured to heap on their heads, it was but fair to ask whether those Gentlemen ever entertained any other opinion, and whether they had not been, at all times, and upon all occasions, equally violent in their opposition—equally loud in their censures—and equally anxious to effect the removal of the present Ministers. The opponents of Ministers at all the public meetings were composed of Whigs and Radicals. Witness the meetings at Liverpool, at Bedford, in Hampshire, in London, &c.; but that the public opinion was not so hostile to Ministers as Gentlemen asserted, appeared from the number of loyal addresses that were pouring in from every part of the country—addresses which had not been procured by any efforts of Ministers, but were the spontaneous expressions of the persens whose names were subscribed.

Sir F. Burdett disclaimed any intention of following the Right Hon. Gentleman who had last spoke through all the rhupsodies he had indulged in. They had no reference to the question before the House. Whether the Whigs had or had not acted inconsistently on this or on that question were matters of perfect indifference to the House and the country, comters or perrect mannerence to the House and the country, com-pared with the present question. But he was not a little sur-prized to hear at this day any set of men, either in or out of the House, declare a belief that the House did in its present form, represent completely, accurately, and properly the feelings of the people. With respect to the question before the House, divesting the matter of all its legal technicalities, and looking diverting the matter of all its legal technicalities, and looking at the plain facts with the aid of common sense, he thought it was impossible to say that Ministers had on this occasion acted with the entire concurrence of the nation. The Hon. Baronet then consuted all the measures pursued with respect to the Queen, and concluded by declaring that Ministers had not exercised that wisdom and sound discretion in the use they had made of the prerogative of the Crown.

The Attorney-General defended himself from the observations of the Hon. Baronet. He regarded not whether the Hon. Baronet gave him credit for correctness of conduct: all who knew him would do him justice. He did not wish to excite improper prejudices against any person, but he thought it his duty to open the case upon the evidence laid before him. He marrated the facts without distending or inflating the charges. Was it his fault that the facts were of a disgusting nature?—It was the fault of the evidence. He did no more than his duty, and the Hon. Burenet did him injustice and wrong when stated that be ought not to have made the statement. Many of the facts were disclosed in the strongest manner and not epened so strong. Many facts were proved by the evidence which went beyond the opening speech.

Mr. Tierney said, if the House really considered the proceedings against her Majesty unimportant, he for one would abstain from saying one word: but if, on the contrary, they considered it a case calling on every Member for his opinion, he should hold himself bound to deliver his sentiments. He then adverted to all the proceedings against the Queen, previous to the Milan Commission being sent out. That body was sent to collect evidence against her Majesty—a step he considered most dangerous to the tranquillity of the country. If the Milan Commission were sent out by His Majesty's Ministers to collect information against the Queen, and no notice was given her of the same, it was unquestionably a proceeding which could not be sufficiently censured. The question now before them was of no common importance, not merely as it affected the Queen, but as it affected the Govern-ment, and would prove how far the sense of the people was spoken by the House of Commons, and so he would only add— "God send them a good deliverance."

Lord Castlereagh was grateful to the Noble Lord who brought this motion forward, and to the Hon. Gentleman who seconded him, for the manly way in which they had put this question on a proper footing, by submitting to the House a vote of censure on Ministers. He (Lord Castlerengh) contended that had Ministers treated the Queen as if her conduct had been believed to be correct, on the supposition that she would remain abroad, they would have placed an instru-ment into her hand which she might have come back to claim to be treated in this country in every respect as Queen Consort.—He could not understand on what principle the King could demand that her Majesty should be received at Foreign Courts, while she was excluded from the Court of England. He denied that the servants of the Crown abrond had failed to treat her with due respect. The instructions sent out (which were not sent till they were required) merely set forth that it was not to be demanded that the Queen should be received at Foreign Courts, seeing she was not received at the Court of Great Britnin.—This was not a very novel case. In proof of this, he might refer to high Whig authority—to the letter written by a Noble Lord to the Honourable Member for Bramber—and to the notice publicly given by the Duke of Grafton when he was Chamberlain in 1737, when it was announced, that any person visiting the Court of Prince Frederick would not be received at that of the King. He would, however, ask, whether any thing so inconsistent could be required as that the King should require the Queen to be received at other Courts, while she was excluded from his own? He should have felt that he dishonoured the Crown, the country to which he be longed, and bimself as a Minister, had be signed a dispatch unsuch circumstances, instructing an Ambassador to make such a demand, and directing him to place himself on one side of the Queen while her courier took his place on the other. On the question of the Liturgy he would not now enter; but this he would assert, that, under all the embarrassing circumstances of the case he would do the same again. He hoped it would not be thought that he was obstinately resolved upon to decide on the arrangement of the Liturgy again, be would do the same again to morrow.—If the House were to go into an enquiry, and Mr. Cooke and Mr. Powell, the legal Gentlemen who conducted the Commission, were brought beforb the House, they would preve that every means of cross-examination and scrutiny which could be devised, had been resorted to in the collecting of the evidence. He could not as honest man, have advised His Majesty to have received the Queen with all the dignities and privileges of his consort, after what her own witnesses had proved against her. The Noble Lord then adverted to the disposition on the part of her Majesty to continue to agitate the country with this question. With respect to the Message which she had sent down to the House a few nights ago, he had never witnessed any proposition received by Parliament under such auspices. disapprobation had pervaded even the ranks of Gentlemen op-posite. With regard to His Majesty, the dawn of his reign had been overclouded by the necessity which compelled him to discharge a great public duty, out of which some unhappy confusion had been brought upon the country. But it was not more clouded than the dawn of his illustrious predecessor's reign, which had afterwards shone forth with so much splen-If he knew his Sovereign's heart, it contained but or consideration but one wish the good of his people. And whatever might have been the impressions in an agitated moment, he was convinced that such sentiments would be returned by the grateful feelings of an affectionate people .-

Noble Lord sat down amidst loud and long continued cheers.

Mr. Broughom observed, that after the many pointed allusions which had been made in the course of the his personal conduct, it became a duty to himself that he should offer an explanation. After alluding to the continued molestations of the Queen, he adverted to the negociation of 1419, to which he had been a party; and proceeded to explain the circumsiances of that negociation, which was without any distinct authority from the Princess of Wales to Mr. B. and, therefore, as he was unauthorised, the negociation fell, as a matter of course, to the ground. He then noticed the negociation of Omer's, the particulars of which are already before the public. The only circumstance having the appearance of novelty was a Queen's intention to treat at all. Mr. B. himself saw no objection to a treaty which could be consistent with her bonour. He desired to repel an insinuation which had been industriously circulated, that his private opinion of the Queen's conduct was at variance with his opinion as her Advocate. On the contrary, he, in the most solemn manner declared, that had he been one of the Queen's Judges, he should have conscientiously given a verdict of Not Guilty.

The question was then loudly called for, and a division took place, when the numbers appeared—For the motion, 178-Against it, 324-Majority in favour of Ministers, 146,-Adjourned at Seven o'clock.

WEDNESDAY. The House met to-day at four a'clock; but upon the Speaker's taking the Chair, he found only thirty-eight Members present, and the House was accordingly Adjourned till

THURSDAY.

Mr. Dennison presented a petition from the Frechelders of the County of Surry, praying for economical reform, the aboli-tion of useless offices, lamenting the late investigation, and praying for the restoration of the Queen's name to the Litz-rgy, as the very means af tranquillizing the public mind, that the Freemolders were unanimous with the exception of about have a dozen dissentients.

Mr. H. Summer admitted that to be the fact, But said that the meeting did not exceed 400.

Mr. Denman went over the ground of the late proceedings against the Queen, and insisted on the necessity of restoring the Queen's name to the Liturgy-

Lord Castlereagh was not indisposed to answer the Hon-Gentleman, nor did he wish to restrain these kind of hattles in Parliament, but when the Hora and Learned Gentleman son-fined himself to the point of the Liturgy, he supposed he had him brief in his hand, which directed him as to the points he was to touch upon, and what he was to say on them-

Mr. Denman here interrupted the Noble Lord'en a point of order. He appealed to the Chair whether he was to submit tosuch misrepresentation. He had spoken as a Member of Par-liament, and as such was entitled to-oredit for the sincerity of his sentiments.

Lord Castlercagh rose, but cries of " Chair," from the Opposition induced him to sit down.

The Speaker stated, that if the House understood, from the mode in which the Noble Lord made his observations, that. they amounted to direct personal imputation, he could have no difficulty in saying that such conduct was highly disorderly— In stating this, he could assure the House, that with respect to-the passage alluded to on the present occasion, he never hade heard any passage, according to his notions, more free from a charge of calumny or direct personal disrespect.

Lord Castlereagh declared that so far from meaning to be disorderly or disrespectful in what he had said, he was rather-desirous of diminishing the responsibility of all that be said. The Hon. Gent. and his Hon. and Learned Friend (Mr. Brougham) often said one thing one day, and contradicted it the next, he thought it but fair and reasonable to conclude that he spokein the character of an Advocate one night, and as a Member of Parliament the next. It appeared, however, that to-night he was to he regarded as speaking in the character of a Member of Parliament. In conclusion, the Noble Lord gave that Honand Learned gentleman notice, as he had done on a former night, as well as to all those who called themselves friends to the Queen, although they were only pursuing their own objects in doing so, and making her an instrument for party purposes, that as long as the system which now prevailed of inflaming. and misleading the public mind was kept up, no restraint whatever should prevent him from stating what he believed to be the truth to the House.

Alderman Wood said in reference to the attack on the Italian witnesses, at Dover, it was nothing more than two or three old women laughing at them and calling out in a genfi voice,, "get home again,"—and this was enough to take them over to Holland for protection.

Mr. Honeycood presented a petition from the County of Kent, the Meeting was held in the Town-hall, and it was the first time that a County Meeting had not been held in the open.

Sir E. Knatchbull suid only five magistrates one of 200 igned the requisition—indeed the Meeting was means to be 105. clusively of the Hon. Gentleman and his friends.

There has been a great deal of business transacted during the week at the Stock Exchange, and bargains to an immense amount have been effected, which have had the effect of keeping up the prices. Consols have been done as high as 73% for the April account, and 73% for the present account, but yesterday, they were lower than they have been for several days. It was expected that before the account day (15th inst.) they would reach as high as 75, which expectation was occasioned by the guildie confidence in the revenue department. The above were the prices at the close of the yesterday's market.

JOHN BULL.

LONDON, FEB. 11.

This week began with a very important discussion in the House of Commons, in which, the Whigs (under the guidance of Lord Tavistock, who after all is, without any compliment, somewhat of a better crator than his father,) made another attempt in the Queen's name, and their own favour, to the principles which guided his Lordship's motion. The observations which we made last week upon Lord Archibald's are perfectly applicable, and we need not therefore repeat them.

The Whigs then, as now, endeavoured to associate to themselves, the Queen's popularity, such as it was; and now, as then, they have discovered that her popularity was fictitious, and her cause disreputable.

The motion was even more adroitly worded than Lord Archibald's, to embrace and include every shade of doubt, or difference, which any man could entertain upon any part of the conduct of the ministers relative to the Queen; but as Mr. Peel justly said, the attempt to ground a vote of censure on some isolated fact, or some minute difference of opinion, on one part of so great a transaction, was unworthy of the principles and manly sincerity by which a British Parliament bestows its confidence; and accordingly we were pleased, but not surprised, to find that the censure upon ministers was rejected by the triumphant majority of There Hundred and there.

Now, as nobody ever pretended that the Ministers could be justified, if the Queen were innocent of the abominable charges which they brought against her, it follows that this immense majority were of opinion, that there were sufficient grounds for these imputations; and thus we have that high judicial Tribunal, the House of Lords, voting, that she was guilty of an adulterous connexion, and ought to be Divorced or Degraded, while the House of Commons, ratifies as far as in it lies, this decision, by refusing to censure the conduct of those, who had instituted and conducted these proceedings.

One very important observation presses itself upon us, in reviewing the whole of this transaction; it is this, that the Whigs do lot, cannot believe the Queen to be innocent, and have taken up her cause, not out of any regard to her, but as a means of hostility against their political antagonists.

Let it be recollected that the question of the Liturgy, whatever be its weight and value, was as complete and (to use a legal expression), as "ready for Trial" this very day twelvemonth as it is to-day; if it was illegal to omit her name, that illegality was complete on the tweefith of February, 1820.

Why did not the Whigs, during the whole of last Session, stir this question? We beg their pardons, Lord Archibald Hamilton did, after a lapse of some months, make a motion upon the subject; but what happened? the proposition was scouted almost by universal consent. The Whigs did not yet foresee how far the credulity of the populace might go, and were not prepared to embark on that stormy sea in so frail a transport as the Queen's reputation.

If the omission was "ill-advised and inexpedient," after the House of Lords had voted the second reading of the bill of degradation, after the words "adulterous intercourse," were confirmed in the preamble, upon Question but without division; after an immense majority established the clause of divorce, and after the bill with all the imputations which it conveyed, all the crimes of which it convicted, and all the penalties which it inflicted; if, we say, the omission was to be considered ill-advised and inexpedient, after all their proceedings, how much more so must it have appeared to any impartial mind, early in the last Session before any of the horrible profligacy detailed in the evidence, had disgusted the public feeling, and excited an abhorrence in every wellregulated mind, which we verily believe would now look upon the introduction of the Queen's name into our holy Liturgy, as little less than an act of profanation and sacrilege?

We intreat our readers to look back on all the gradual steps of this connexion between our Lords the Whigs and our Lady the Queen, and they will be convinced, as generally happens to rich old Ladies, that the attentions of the Gentlemen have been prompted neither by love, nor respect for her, but simply with the hope of bettering themselves in the world; and we will venture to prophecy that the result of the transaction will not differ from the ordinary course of such affairs; and that as soon (and very soon it will be,) as the Whigs find that they can get nothing more by courting the old Lady, they will abandon her to a state of desertion and contumely, which will be rendered more bitter by the remembrance of their present flatteries. But one very serious faux pas they have had the indiscretion to commit, out of which we prophecy they will not escape with success or with credit. The Queen has been advised to pledge herself in a message to the House of Commons, that she would not receive one farthing of public money till her name should be inserted in the Liturgy. Her name will be inserted in the Liturgy about the Greek Kalends, and her annuity will of course not become payable till latter Lammas; but how is she to exist in the meanwhile? Whence are the funds to come for the necessaries, or the comforts, or the laxuries of Brandenburg House? the pageants of St. Paul's? and the Monday's processions? to say nothing of the salaries of Ledy Anne and Keppell Craven, the schooling of Sir William Austin, the pensions of Flynn, Hownam, and other witnesses? the travelling expenses of Vassali and Carlo Forti? and the regal splendour with which that "fortunate youth," Bartholomew Bergami, astonishes all Europe from the Pas de Calais to Abruzzo!!! "Aye, there's the rub!"

We hear that the Whigs have had the justice (we cannot even call it the generosity) to pledge themselves that they will out of their private purses make up to the Queen the provision which they have advised her to refuse from the public: indeed they could do no less; and although we cannot be suspected of flattering them, we will say, that such a resolution does infinite credit to their liberality, their justice, and their personal honour.

We have never denied to many of the Lords and centlemen at the head of that party, a Gentle-meant to place John Bull in the very front of this man-like superiority to mere pecuniary considerations, and a steady attachment to those who have suffored any loss by attachment to their party; and we, therefore, in this respect, applaud and approve, although we cannot in any other, the pledge which has been given to provide by a subscription of the Opposition an annuity of fifty thousand pounds for the Queen.

A Committee has already been formed at Brookes's for that purpose, composed of Gentlemen, some of whom, we conclude, (Major General Wilson, poer fellow, being of the number) are expected to make up by the activity of their solicitations, for the deficiency of their pecuniary assistance; but on the other hand, we are informed that some great noblemen have promised to mark by the respective magnitude of their gifts, these proportionate degrees of conviction of her Majesty's innocence.

All those who can lay their hands upon their hearts, and say that she is innocent, and pure as "unsunned snow," will it is thought book up twenty thousand at least. The not guilties will, it is supposed, be rated at ten thousand (and to say the truth they are men of ten thousand,) the "not proven" men will probably imitate the economical Caledonians in their contributions, as in their verdict:—We suspect it will be difficult to screw more than five thousand out of them. The expediency people, poor creatures, like Lord Grantham, and the Duke of Richmond, may get off for five pounds; and Lord Kenyon (who as far as we know, gave no reason at all for his vote) will do very hand-somely if he contributes (as he does to so many other charities) a one pound note!

We would advise the Queen's friends not to press any matter to another division in the House of Lords; for if this scale be once established, we venture to predict that Lord Kenyon will rival Lord Grey in the confidence of the Whigs upon this important question.

There is one Noble Lord who must not be confounded with any of the before-mentioned classes:-All the rest have voted for the Queen either on political or judicial views of her case; but he has "eaten of her bread and drunken of her cup;" he has partaken of her hospitality, and shewn a clear and irrefragable (though we think mistaken) conviction of her immaculate purity, by introducing into her seciety the amiable and innocent young creature whom he has associated to the ancient honours of his house, and from whom, as from a new fountain of honour, his blood is to be transmitted to his latest posterity. We mean the Duke of Leinster. All jesting apart, we cannot venture to limit the obligations which this Noble Duke may feel that the Queen has on his liberality; and, however we may differ in opinion with him on other subjects, we trust that the generosity of his nature and his nation will be conspicuously testified in the amount of his subscription .- Nous ver-

We shall not lose sight of this subject: the "Queen's Subscribers" may afford materials for a list almost as important as the "Queen's Visitors." We shall take care, when the subscription is full, to have the names and sums printed on a fair sheet of vellum paper, which every Englishman, who has any gratitude in his composition, will no doubt frame, glaze, and hang up in his parlour, in honour of those patriot gentlemen who shall have so nobly vindicated a persecuted woman, and so generously saved their distressed country Fifty Thousand a Year!

God speed the subscription, says JOHN BULL.

The public has read with a surprise, almost bordering on incredulity, the speech attributed in the public reports, of the debate of Tuesday last, to Mr. Brougham.—Mr. Brougham has the reputation of being an able man, not deficient in that species of holdness which is sometimes called impudence, but really a poorer, weaker, or more shuffling speech than the reporters have put into his mouth, we have never read; in some parts it appears to us wholly unintelligible, and in others, in which he is made to speak rather plainly, it is in direct contradiction with itself; in one place it is virulent, and in the next, mawkish,—fearless and furious in its attack upon others, lame and timid in defence of himself!

How much of all this belongs to Mr. Brougham, and how much to his reporter, we have no means of judging: all we have to say is, that whatever fame Mr. Brougham may have gained by former reports of the debates, is destroyed in the most humiliating manner by this miliating manner by this.

It appears that Mr. Brougham began his own defence by making a violent attack upon that portion of the Press which had exposed the conduct of the Queen, and reprobated that of her female visitors; we flatter ourselves that Mr. Brougham meant to place John Rull, in the very front of this listile, indeed we know that he did, and although it is somewhat inksome to us to be under obligations to such a man as Mr. Brougham, we do, nevertheless, heartily thank him for his complimentary invective; we shall not dwell long upon what is personal to ourselves, but if Mr. Brougham, as he is represented to have done, accused us of base, unworthy, or unmanly conduct or feelings, we tell him, or his reporter, that HE SPEARS FALSELY.

We are actuated by principles higher than, perhaps, he can conceive, purer, perhaps, than he may be willing to imitate; we have no personal motives; we have no private objects; our suffrage and our support, whatever may be its value, has never been bought or sold; we have never betrayed friendship, nor abused confidence; we have never dabbled in secret intrigues, nor skulked behind others from any responsibility with which we have been charged; and whenever our conduct has been arraigned, we have not hesitated to offer clear and intelligible, and in that sense satisfactory answers.

It is true indeed that we have felt it our duty to state the reasons why Mrs. Brougham's visit to the Queen, does not appear to us to be conclusive evidence of Her Majesty's purity: this is perhaps what Mr. Brougham, in his noble and gentleman-like indignation, affects to call base and unmanly; but what epithets of the slang-dictionary, of which he is so great a master, would he apply to him who was the cause of all this scandal? who for purposes old his own (political or private, we care not), could drag a reluctant lady from her retirement, and exhibit her in the porch of Brandenburg House, as asseverating on the faith of her own immaculate purity, the virtue of the Queen.

We do from our hearts regret that even so many as half a dozen Englishwomen should have mixed themselves up as evidences, and parties, in this odious transaction; and still deeper was our regret, at feeling it to be our public duty to expose, and, by exposure to defeat the object of such lamentable conduct; but again we say, for the pain which this exposure may occasion, let the interesting, although unhappy sufferers, blame not us, but those who forced them into so painful a publicity.

The sacred respect which every Englishman feels for the female sex, the solace, and the ornament of cur existence, was the very principle upon which the Queen's visit-hunters calculated, and they endeavoured to undermine the morals of the country, by means of the very respect which those morals excite and deserve; and if we had submitted to be imposed upon by these machinations, and to accept the evidence of Mss. Brougham, or Lady Anne Hamilton, or Mrs. Damer, as conclusive testimonies of the Queen's purity, we should probably by this time have seen the female society of the metropolis infected by Bergamis and Oldis.

But too much of this: let us now return to Mr. Brougham himself; as we find that he reads John Bull, we should be somewhat mortified at his not condescending to answer any of our former questions, except that it appears by the report of his speech, that he equally declined to answer any of the very pointed charges which Lord Castlereagh made to his face.

In the kimited view of the debate, which a weekly paper can give, our readers will not expect to find the means of judging of the extent to which Mr. Brougham pushed his reserve and silence upon the most material points; but we have, as was our duty, attentively read over all the reports of the debate in the daily papers, and do not find in any of them that Mr. Brougham even attempted to answer the grave inculpations which were made against him; and from the silence of a man, on all other occasions so talkative, we are forced to infer that all the charges are well founded.

One indeed, and a most extraordinary one it was, he had the grace to confess, namely, that without the knowledge or authority of the Queen, he had begun, and carried on a negociation with the King's Ministers, by which she was to take the incognito title of Duchess of Cornwall, and thus virtually submit to one step of degradation. How long this negociation lasted, we cannot gather from the report, ms that Mr. Bro adviser of the Queen, was (also in profound secresy,) designates as the Queen's bitterest enemies, and it would seem as if his first coolness with the Ministers in this confidential intercourse of theirs, was because the Ministers refused to proceed in the negociation, unless Mr. Brougham could procure the Queen's authority for his interference : as the attempt to obtain this authority would have burst the bubble Mr. Brougham's secret importance, it would appear, as well as we can collect, that the Queen was for eighteen months kept in complete ignorance that her sheen friend and councillor was in communication with her enemies: If this be a true state of the case, (and it is the best we can collect from the report of the debate,) the English language has not words to express our horror at such duplicity.

But a more scrious charge against Mr. Brougham, was the non-production at St. Omer's, of the proposition with which he had been entrusted by Lord Liverpool to deliver to the Queen: this seems to us to have been a triple breach of confidence, to give it the mildest name; it was a deceit upon Lord Liverpool, a deceit upon Lord Hutchinson, and a deceit on the Queen.

Of a reply to this we do not find in any of the papers, the smallest trace, it would seem that he either by his silence confessed the charge, or touched upon it in so confused a manner as to be unintelligible; in fact we know that no satisfactory answer can be given for such disingenuous proceedings.

But what followed appears to have been still worse, while he kept the real proposition in his own pocket, he manœuvred to extract from Lord Hutchinson (a worthy and short-sighted Nobleman, who had the misfortune to accompany this harlequin to St. Omer's), a proposition which Lord Hutchinson was not authorized to make, which Mr. Brougham knew he was not authorized to make, and which nevertheless Mr. Brougham allowed the Queen to receive as authorized and genuine: here, again we say, the printed speech affords not a syllable of denial or explanation.

Numerous are the other points which Mr. Brougham was called upon to explain, and upon which he appears to have been silent; we have not leisure, at present, to pursue this matter further, but as a fit conclusion of this sketch of his intrigue and traffic, we beg leave to remind our readers of the two interrogatories which we have heretofore put to Mr. Brougham—

First, Whether he did not effer to resign the office of Attorney-General to the Queen, provided His Majesty's Ministers would give him, in consideration of his leaving the Queen, the same rank that her Attorney-Generalship would have bestowed.

that her Attorney-Generalship would have bestowed.

And secondly, Whether he did not write a letter to one of the Queen's opponents, in which, smongst other very curious matter, the following expression is to be found, "We must not let THAT DEVIL come over the water to us," by THAT DEVIL, meaning her Majesty the Queen, whose graces he admires, and for whose innocence he vouches with the most solemn imprecations.

We know not what his Whig friends will say to the exposure of all these underhand dealings; of this obscure and filthy spirit of intrigue; of a proneness to betray, so invincibly strong as almost to overmatch the cravings of self-interest, and the antipathies of faction; but we think we may say that whatever figure Mr. Brougham's talents may enable him to make in the Senate or at the Bar, he has shewn in his private conduct between the Queen and the King's Ministers a want of sincerity, which in spite of still greater abilities than he possesses would render him odious to every man who loves plain-dealing, and is attached to those old-fashioned principles of fidelity and honour which are the best characteristics of an English Gentleman.

He may be—

"Sagacious, bold and turbulent of wit;"

But he, in a still more eminent degree, deserves the opprobrium of a former part of the "false Achitophel's" character of being

"For close designs and crooked councils fit."

Our readers will see in another part of our Paper, that the Court of King's Bench has granted a criminal information for an alleged libel on Lady Caroline Wrottesley: we are the first to admit, that, considering the affidavits laid before them, the Court could do no less; and, if all the facts stated in these affidavits to be true, we shall have done a great injustice and injury to the memory of that Lady, and to the feelings of her surviving friends. If they shall be substantially confirmed in evidence we shall not be sorry (however the result may affect ourselves) at the restoration of the character of a Lady, which nothing but our anxiety for female character, induced us to impeach.

We are equally above the vulgar boldness of braving the law, and the meanness of averting attacks by hypocrite and servile eringing; our readers will, therefore, excuse us for declining to enter either into justification or extenuation; we shall reserve what we may have to offer for the proper time and a legitimate tribunal, protesting that we had, and have no kind of personal feeling in this case; that we have no kind of acquaintance with the family either of the husband or the lady, and never had the slightest communication with any member of either; that we stated on public grounds and for public purposes ever the result of a trial may determine that point; we are confident that no improper motives of personal hostility or private animosity will be ever alleged against us.

Connected with this view of the subject, and therefore fit to be even now alluded to, is a statement made and insisted on by Mr. Searlett, in moving for the Rule, namely, "that extraordinary pains had been taken to distribute the papers, containing the alleged libel, in the neighbourhood of the country seats of both the families."

If this were true, it would indeed seem to shew, that we were actuated rather by private than public motives, and that we wished rather to hurt the feelings of individuals than to guard (as far as our hamble efforts could go) the public morals. But this statement is wholly unfounded: we were ignorant, until we read Mr. Soundett's attatement, where either of the families resided; and it is therefore almost unnecessary to add, that we did not intentionally send any paper into their particular neighbourhood; nor, indeed, any where, except to the regular orders of our subscribers.

With these sentiments, and with this explanation, we shall await our trial in the face of the country, with that respectful silence which we owe to the law, and that proud attitude of innocence which we own to ourselves.

COLONEL BROWNE.

We have been favoured with the following account of the infamous attempt to assassinate the above gentleman; and, as it contains more details than have yet been published, we think it will be interesting to our readers.— On Monday night, the 8th ult. about half past twelve o'clock, as the Colonel was returning home from the theatre, on foot, alone, having just quitted the Duke of Leeds, he was overtaken by two men, about one hundred yards from his own house. One of them gave him a smart blow on the shoulder, at the same time saying "Colonello" Browne," as if to ascertain that he was right in the person, and on doing so, said, "eccoti al fine"—(here you are at last.) The Colonel immediately received a violent blow with a poigmand, on the left side, which he at first sup-posed to have been with the first, the villain who gave it exclaiming, "Ora é finite per lei!"—(There is an end of you;) and instantly ran away: The blow was so severe as to deprive him at the moment of the power of calling out for assistance; it seemed as if the ris had yielded to the blow, and then returned to its place. The second fellow did not attempt to attack him, nor had he apparently any weapon in his hand; but the Colonel certainly owes his life to his own presence of mind, for expecting to be again assailed, and desirous, if possible, to take the villain, he attacked the second fellow, struggled with him, and finding himself getting weak, fell on one knee, got hold of the assassin's leg, and threw him down. In the souffle, the fellow got out a sharp knife, and inflicted three bad wounds behind the left ear, close to the jugular vein, and on the spot where Colonel Browne had received a severe sabre wound after the battle of Vittoria, While struggling, it occurred to him, that he might secure a shoe from the fellow's foot, to assist in leading to a discovery, and he succeeded. As soon as he could, the assassin got away, and made off after his companion. Colonel Browne then rose, took the shoe with him, and was pruceeding home, but he then found he was wounded, began to be faint, and was obliged to support himself against a wall. In this situation be does not know how long he remained, but he at length succeeded in getting home, having, however, unfortunately dropped the shoe, without recollecting when or where. His cloak saved him; for, from the many folds of the garment, through which the weapon passed, it must have been exceedingly sharp, and must inevitably have killed him, had its progress not been impeded by the resistance of the cloth. It struck on the point of one of the ribs, which has been much injured: had the blow been a quarter of an inch lower, it must have been fatal, as it would have entered the cavity, and struck the heart.

We have great pleasure in being able to add to the

We have great pleasure in being able to add to the above statement, that Colonel Browne, from the last accounts, which came down to the 20th ult. continued in a favourable state; he has had no fever. The wounds in the head are almost healed, and that in the side is much less troublesome. An exfoliation of a piece of the rib has taken place, since which he has been easier—has been able to sit up in a chair for two or three hours, and has had a few hours of refreshing sleep for a night or two, of kind of acquaintance with the family either of the husband or the lady, and never had the slightest communication with any member of either; that we stated on public grounds and for public purposes what we believed to be a public truth; and how-

It would be useless to waste conjectures, quarter from which this blow could spring, although we have our suspicions; we must, however, hope a discovery will be made, and the instigators, be they high or low. brought to condign punishment. Suffice it to say, that during the whole of his residence at Milan, Colonel Browne has never had a quarrel with any person there, nor ever been engaged in an affair of gallantry, which could have drawn upon him either the eye of the public, or the stiletto of jealousy or revenge.

The inhabitants of Milan are exceedingly shocked at such a diabolical attempt to take away the life of a person who is there universally beloved and esteemed; and their kindness to him scarcely knows any bounds.

He expects himself to be well enough to begin his journey to England, by easy stages, in foorteen or fifteen days, trusting to his excellent spirits and good constitu-tion; but his medical advisers are not so sanguine; they calculate it will be a month before he is able to move.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Paris, Jan. 13.-Neveu, the person who destroyed himself after he was arrested on a charge of being one of the persons concerned in the late atrocious attempt upon the Royal Family, had several papers in his possession when he was taken. He had been in trade, and lately when he was taken.

The had in a sort of girdle a considerable sum in gold. On the day of the explosion at the Thuilleries, he had bought at different places, and in different disguises, twelve pounds weight of gunpowder. When arrested, he offered money for his release to the officer of Police. He had no settled abode in Paris, and usually passed the night in the worst places. He was a native of Rheims. Another person has been arrested in the Court of the Thuilleries. Even the Journals which call themselves liberal, do not deny that persons of different circumstances from those of Neveu must have been instigators of his crime.

Nothing has transpired respecting the negociations at sybach. The following list of Ministers assembled Laybach.

I.AW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, WESTMINSTER, Feb. 7.
Mr. Scarlett, on the part of a Mr. Davy, moved for a criminal information against two persons, for a contempt of Court under these circumstances:—two persons, of the names of under these circumstances:—two persons, of the names of Davy and Sloane, carried on business in Devonshire. One of them was the brother of the person who was now applying to the Court. They borrowed, from time to time, from 3 to 4,0001, of his (Mr. S.'*s) elient, giving him some securities for the payment of these sums; but in the end they became bankrupts. A commission was sued out, and in their examinations before the commissioners, the bankrupts confessed that they owed Mr. Davy something above 20001. Mr. Davy afterwards, thinking that they had concealed some part of their property. owed Mr. Davy something above 20001. Mr. Davy afterwards, thinking that they had concealed some part of their property, had them arrested and thrown into the King's Bench Prison. Soon after this, a sort of warning was given him, coming from the bankrupts; that if he did not give over all further proceedings, he would be sorry for it: they intimated to him, that they would get persons to swear that he owed them sham debts, and have him arrested. Mr. Davy treated this base and cowardly communication with the contempt it merited; but in effect, in a few days he was arrested in three several actions for 14,0001. at the suit of the bunkrupts. There was no attorney's name to any of the writs, and they were not made returnable to the end of Trinity Term; so that Mr. Davy, if he had not been bailed, would have him a long time in gaol. he had not been bailed, would have him a long time in gaol. It was by great accident that he did get bail, for he was arrested in London, where he was not much known, his own residence being in Devoishire. Mr. Scarlett observed, that if ever there was a case where a contempt of the process of this Court was made a handle of injustice and oppression, this was one. He hoped, therefore, their Lordships would not besitate to grant the criminal information.

The Chief Justice said, the only difficulty in his mind was

Mr. Davy a notione had not been vet was arrested. It was, however, so gross a case, that the Court would overlook that consideration, and grant a rule to show cause.

The rules for a criminal information against the Earl of Westmeath for language, tending to excite a Mr. Wood to a breach of the peace was made absolute.

The King v. Tyler.

This was a criminal prosecution by the Society for the Suppression of Vice, against the defendant, a bookseller in Wychstreet, Drury-lane, for selling that part of Paine's works which is called The Age of Reason. The defendant was tried at Westminster before the Chief Justice, and the Jury recommended him to mercy.

He was now brought up for judgment on the motion of Mr.

The Court permitted him to address them in mitigation of punishment, and effidavits for the same porpose we're put in aed read. He pleated ill health and a large family as a motive with the Court for lightening the heatene upon him. In his address he relied a good deal on the recommendation to a vercy

The Court having taken the whole matter into their condi-deration, sentenced the defendant to three months' imprison-ment in Coldburth-fields' prison, and so find security in 501. to keep the peace for three years.

The King v. Wooder, Cartwright, Sec.
Mr. Prendergast and Mr. Weoler were heard as great length in their arguments in support of a new trial. These arguments, and the several grounds on which the defendants went, have been published so often, that we should but fitting our meaders if we were again to repeat them.

The Court did not give judgment on the question, but seserved the consideration of it to a future day. The Chief Justice said, it was a question affecting not the present defendants alone, but the administration of justice generally.

THURSDAY.—The Rule for a Criminal Information against the Rey. R. Blacow, M. A. for a libel on the Queen presched in a sermon at Livespool, and subsequently published, was enlarged till next Term.

The Attorney General moved the judgment of the Court upon Sir Francis Burdett for the publication of a Nibelbeus

The affidavit of Sir Francis was put in, which stated that he had been a Member of Parliament for twenty-five years, and a firm supporter of the constitution and laws of the country be deprecated the use of military force in putting down the subjects' right of petitioning;—as to the letter in question, he did not think it derogatory to the character or conduct of a man or gentleman.

Mr. Scarlett rose to address the Court. He dwelt on the excellence of the private and public character of the Hon. Baronet, Sir Francis Burdet; he said he had shown the highest respect for the laws on every occasion; and his whole life proved that he always supported the Government and the Law.

Mr. Denman followed on the same side, and went over the circumstances attending the Manchester meeting; but there was nothing new in the arguments of any of the Counsel.

Mr. Justice Bayley then pronounced judgment. His Lord-ship, addressing Sir F. Burdett, said it was his poinful and unpleasant duty, in the situation he held, to puss on him the sen-tence, which, after a careful consideration of all the circumstances, the Court felt themselves called upon to pass. It stances, the Court felt themselves called upon to pass. It happened, that in the course of the proceedings, some variance of opinion had occurred. It was, however, a difference of a technical description, namely, whether there was a proof of the publication in the gounty of Leicester. There could, however, have been no doubt, if the Court had granted a new trial, other evidence might have been found to shew that it was a proof of the publication the court of the court had granted a new trial, other evidence might have been found to shew that it was a proof of the publication the court of the publication of the publication of the court of the publication of the publicati circulated in the county, and that would in law have been a publication. In the letter to Lord Sidmouth, the Defendant publication. In the letter to Lord Sidmouth, the Defendant admitted himself to be the author, and that being the case, it was for the Court to say what was a proper punishment for a libel of this nature and character. The Hon. Baronet had also assumed, without the smallest proof, that the Government was a premeditating party to the outrage on which he had made so strong a comment. The Court, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, did order and adjudge, "That you, Sir Rrancis Burdett, for this offence, do pay a fine of 2000l. and that you be imprisoned in the custody of the Marshalsea, for the term of three calendar months, shal of the Marshalses, for the term of three calendar months, and remain imprisoned till such fine is paid."

The sentence was received, within and without the walls,

Sir John Wrottesley, of Wrottesley in the County of Stafford, Baronet, maketh oath and saith, that in the year One Thousand Seven Hundred and Ninety-five he intermarried with Lady Caroline Bennet, daughter of the Earl and Countess of Tankerville, and that during the period of twenty-two years and upwards in which he was blessed with her society, they had fourteen children, of whom six soms and five daughters survived their mother, and five sons and five daughters are now living. And this Deponent further saith, that to his great anguish and regret his said wife died in the year One Thousand Bight Hundred and Eighteen, six weeks after child-birth, in the arms of this Deponent, who in deep affliction, accomphailed by his three eldest sons, followed her remains to the grave. And this Deponent further saith, that his said wife was a lady of strict honor, fidelity, and chastity; and that he has heard with horror and indignation of a base attempt to injure her memory so fondly cherished with respect, esteem and affection by such of his children as were of an age duly to appreciate the care, attention andentire devotion of their mother's time and health to their instruction and welfare. And this Deponent also saith, that there is not the slightest ground or foundation for the infamous assertion published in a Newspaper called "John Bull," namely, that this Deponent's said wife had been detected in a crientmal intrigue with a meanla servant—her for any aspersion of that nature upon her character.

JOURNAL OF MADEMOISELLE DEMONT.

A Translation of the Journal of Mademoiselle Demont having been published by the Queen's booksellers, upon which we take the liberty of making a few remarks.

Mr. Garston, the translator, says, that "unless there existed some powerful motives for its abstraction from public notice, this Journal would have been published before this by the lady or some one of her friends."

Mademoiselle Demont's reasons for not publishing the Journal were: first, that she saw no possible advantage arising from attempting her justification at a time when noise and clamour had taken the places of argument and discussion, and that it appeared to her better, if she ever did publish it, to wait till the whole affair had terminated in which she has been so unfortunately mixed up.

· Secondly, having the greatest aversion from notoriets. and her Journal having been written only for the amusement of her mother and friends, who were anxious to hear from her an account of her travels, she always regarded it as a trifle unworthy the eye of the public, and more likely to draw upon her the censure and ridicule of criticism than any mark of approbation. It is a pity that she cannot be prevailed upon yet to publish the goauine Journal, and add as a postscript all the facts relating to the Queen (since the beginning of November, 1817,) of which she is in possession. The real truth is this, that when Mademoiselle Demont left the Queen and arrived in Switzerland, she found the conduct and character of the Queen universally condemned, and as she from her situation was supposed to be capable of throwing a light upon the subject, she was assailed on all sides with questions. There was but one alternative, either she was to confirm the prejudicial reports by speaking the truth, and thus increase the disgust which was felt for the Princess, or to soften down the violent prejudice which existed against her by speak.

ing to her advantage. Guided by that pure spirit of Christian charity which directs us to hide the faults of our neighbours, she did not hesitate which line to take, little thinking that she should ever be called upon to swear to the truths which she had assiduously concealed—this accounts for her silence on those points to which she was subsequently compelled to speak.

Now with respect to the Journal itself, it differs in many points and expressions from the original. In saying this, we do not mean to find fault with Mr. Garston's fidelity in translating; but simply to remark, that the Journal differs from that which Mademoiselle Demont wrote and which is still in her possession. The difference between them is not great as to quantity of matter, but there are additions, curtailments, and alterations here and there, which we shall point out to our readers.

In the passage relative to the Myrtle of the Temple of Venus at Athens. Mr. Garston's copy has this paregraph:

"It surely must be an exertion of the power of the Goddess Protectress of Love, of which the myrtle is emblematic, and consequently demonstrates, that it is in vain to attempt to destroy love: it always resumes its post."

And here Mr. Garston, "to make assurance double sure," gives us the French passage:

Qu'on a beau couper l'amour jusqu'a la racine, et faire tous ses efforts pour le detruire." This certainly gives an air of genuineness as well as of levity to the remark; but nevertheless, the words quoted are not in Mademoiselle Demont's Journal. Her words are these:

"Il avoit deja eté brulé et coupé jusqu'a la racine, mais il à toujours repoussé, et il etoit dans ce moment un des plus benux que nous avions jamais vu."

The pretty allusion to the goddess and the protectress of love, if in the copy Mr. Garston has translated is not Mademoiselle Demont's, and if not in that copy, is the pure offspring of his own poetical mind.

At page 40, of Mr. Garston's translation. He has this passage:--

"Our company consisted in all of two hundred and eighty individuals, and presented the appearance of a small army."

Mademoiselle Demont's Journal states the number of persons to be " nearly an hundred."

But at page 42, comes the paragraph which has been quoted upon Mademoiselle Demont in all the papers and pamphlets and reviews of the faction, as an insurmount able impeachment of her veracity, and a daring evidence of her tergiversation.

"This circumstance recalled to me strongly the Day of Palms (Palm Sunday), on which our Saviour made, in the savine manner, his entry into Jerusalem. I imagined I beheld him, and inwardly made comparisons: for assuredly, if any one can in any way resemble our great Saviour, it is this excellent Princess. She is, like him, charitable, mild, and beauchient to all; she has suffered much, and always supports her misfortures with corest nations, and segmentary. tunes with great patience and resignation; and, like him, she has not deserved them."

This is strong language, and prephane language, repre-hensible in the highest degree, and declaratory not only of the authoress's want of respect for the divine personage she dares to allude so; but of her violent and enthusiastic devotion to the virtuous, charitable, mild and beneficent Queen. How can Mademoiselle Demont get over this? We will answer for her in four words. She never whote it.

Mademoiselle Demont's words are these :-

"Le 12. Au matin on fut encore contraint de dresser les tentes et de passer la journée en plein air, Jerusalem n'étoit plus elsigné que de six lieux. Son Altesse Royale desiroit y'arriver ce jour la, c'est pousquoi à trois heures on partit, et a neuf heures des soir nous arrivames dans la Capitale de la

"On the morning of the twelfth, we were again obliged to pitch our tents, and to pass the day in the open air. Jerusalem was not more than six leagues distant; her Royal Highwess desired to arrive there on that day (Palan Sunday), and there-fore we set out at three o'clock, and at aims in the evening, we arrived at the capital of Judea."

Not one single syllable of comparison (always odions, and in this case blasphemous) came from the pen of Mademoiselle Demont. In short, the whole of Mr. Garston's version of the journal is full of errors; not so consequential as that we have just quoted. It may, however, be as well to observe, that the paragraph at page 55, beginning—"We there offered up our thanks, &c." and ending with "the threatened dangers" at page 57, is not in Miss Demont's journal.

We do not, as we said before, attribute these errors and alterations to Mr. Garston, but we are aware of the difficulty of the same of the same of the difficulty of the same of the s culty he had in obtaining a copy, from which he could make a translation at all.

We know that he twice sent a person from Morgues to endeavour by various little stratagems to get hold of the journal from Mademoiselle Demont's mother; on one of those occasions, flattery was resorted to, and the person only wished to read it, after the great eulogies which he had heard bestowed upon it. But her mother refused it; and then Mr. Garston and Mr. Fyson went to Mr. Gaulis to get it of him; but Mr. Gaulis refused, and sent off to his wife, on the subject; and when Mr. Fyson and Mr. Garston went to her, she told them that she had but a part of Miss Demont's journal, and that it contained nothing to her disadvantage; indeed, its tendency was beneficial to her rather than not. The gentlemen said they were quite aware of that, and that they had several copies of the journal, which they intended to print, but that one copy differed so much from another, that they were puzzled as to their correctness.

We know, also, that Messrs. Garston and Fyson were in every house at which Miss Demont was in the habit of visiting at Collombier, and other places, inquiring what she had been accustomed to say of the Queen.— This, as they "had the honour" to be employed to collect evidence in the Queen's favour, was natural enough, and we find no fault with it; but we must notice what Madame Gaulis is made to say in Mr. Garston's introduction.

Madam Gaulis, according to Mr. Garston "Expressed the utmost astonishment at the part which Demont had acted, she having always spoken of her Majesty with the highest respect, and in terms of unhesitating praise, whenever her name was mentioned during the visits, which, in wasonever ner name was mentioned during the visits, which, in consequence of her having held a place about her Majesty's person, and of the false colouring given by her to her return home, she was invited to make at her mansion. She was at a loss to account for it otherwise, than by ascribing it to the influence exerted over her by the Italian who conducted her to Milan."

Now it so happens, that Madame Gaulis, only passing a few weeks in the summer at her country-house, Miss Demont never had the pleasure of exchanging a syllable with her, except once, and that was after her return from Milan, in 1819; and it is evident that she could not have spoken in the Queen's praise then, because she had, at that time, made her depositions against her. That Madame Gaulis should have invited Miss Demont to her house, because she held a place about her Majesty's person, is not likely, because all that family speak of the Queen in terms much less equivocal than Martigny and others.

That Madam Gaulis should be so surprised at Made-mosselfe Demont's having formerly spoken well of the Queen, is very surprising to us, who know that her daughter has recently said, that she thought Miss Demont had acted much better in speaking favourably of the Queen, before her compulsatory journey on the subject, than she would have done in repeating that, which could not fail to be disadvantageous to her.

With respect to the translation, we are no judges of its merits, not having seen the original from which Mr. Garston has rendered it into English; but comparing it with Mademoiselle Demont's work, we find her ideas and expressions conveyed in language infinitely inferior to the French; and, indeed, the whole thing is done in a slovenly manner.

We now take leave of Mr. Garston and the journal; but we must observe, in concluding, that, as that gentleman is a clerk in the house of Marietti, (miscalled by our printer, Marionetti), he would do the great Lady, who does him the honour to employ him, a very great service, if he could throw a little light upon the affair of the three dishonoured bills of exchange, which we have no-ticed once or twice, and the bill which was filed in Chaneery, in consequence of the conduct of his illustrious patroness therein.

THEATRES.

IT is a fortnight this day since we ventured humbly to call upon our beloved Sovereign to gratify us with his presence in our public places: we did so, because we knew it to be in accordance with the wishes of all his affectionate and dutiful subjects. - We are happy to be able to announce that those wishes were complied with twice last week-his Majesty honoured each Theatre with a visit in state.

The King on Tuesday commanded Artasernes, and a farce called Who's Who, at Drury-Lane: early in the afternoon, a crowd began to collect round the playhouse, which continued increasing till the pressure became terrific; the narrow streets and alleys with which the building is so conveniently surrounded were completely choked up, and the rush into it when the doors were opened was without a precedent; however, we have not heard of any ac-

Precisely at seven o'clock, his Majesty entered the box on the right hand of the Proscenium, known by the name of the Committee Box, which had been fitted up in rather a slovenly manuer for his reception. His Majesty wore a blue uniform, and was accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of York and Clarence, dressed in the respective uniforms of their exalted rank. The Duke of Montrose, Lord Catheart, and the usual state attendants fellowed.

To describe the enthusiasm with which the King was received by the audience is impossible—hats and handkerchiefs waved in every part of the House, and the shouts of applause lasted nearly five minutes; his Majesty remained standing, bowing graciously to the people. The national anthem of "GOD SAVE THE KING" was then sung, and was only the signal for the renewal of cheerings and shoutings. When the tumult had ended, his Majesty took his seat, and the Opera commenced.

At the conclusion of the first act the applause was renewed, and his Majesty rose and bowed to the audience, who seized every interval in the performance to testify their delight at seeing him, as well as every applicable point in the piece to evince their still stronger feelings of love for his person.

At the end of the farce, His Majesty retired amidst thunders of applause similar to those which greeted his entrance.

On Wednesday, His Majesty proceeded to Covent Garden Theatre, to see Twelfth Night and the new Pantomime. He was dressed in a plain soarlet uniform, and wore the Ribband and Star of the Garter, and the insignia of the Golden Fleece. Their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of York and Clarence accompanied the King.

The House was, of course, crowded to an overflow in every part; and more unequivocal marks of affection were never bestowed on a Sovereign than those displayed on the occasion. In the anthem of God save the King, the lines

"Oh Lord our God arise, "Scatter his enemies,
"And make them fall,"

produced such a tumult of cheering and waving of hands, hats, and handkerchiefs, as we never witnessed in a Theatre.

His Majesty remained till the end of the Pantomime, and retired amidst the cheerings of his people.

Of the entertainments at either House we have no room to speak; nor would it be fair to select such nights for remarks;—the only visible alteration in the performance of any individual from the ordinary course, was perceptible in the acting of Miss Tree in Viola: there was a sensitive timidity in her manner, evidently produced by her audience, which gave even new grace to her delineation of that character.

We never saw the King look better; and we now put it to the thousands of his subjects, who with us had the happiness of seeing him on these two occasions, whether, in the manly form, the fine countenance, the noble, the dignified, yet unassuming grace of his manner, they could trace the faintest resemblance to the filthy and disgusting caricatures with which the radical print-shops abound, and by which (till the year of mourning had expired which kept him from public entertainments) the deluded mob formed their estimate of His Majesty's personal appearance?-We put this question, certain of the answer we must receive from every individual who was in either Theatre.

This should weigh heavily on the minds of the middling and lower classes, when they hear their King traduced; they should recollect that the same black-hearted Reformers (as they call themselves, Revolutionists as they are,) who have the effrontery to put forth abominable caricatures, which His Majesty, by merely showing himself, falsifies in a moment, are equally active in the dissemination of libels on his character and conduct; and that the character and Magistrate.

conduct assigned to him by these wretches are as remote from the truth, as their hideous prints are from a resemblance to the noble person they affect to

We have a word or two to say to the Old Times. Speaking of the box fitted up for His Majesty at Drury Lane, that Paper, wretched at being unable to disguise the fact of His Majesty's reception, says, "The box in which His Majesty sat was decorated with much taste for his reception, and advantageously placed for the view of the audience. It was, however, a private box, and wholly separated from them: we recol-lect the late King used to take an honest pride in occupying a public box, and placing himself in the mides of the subjects whose affections he enjoyed."

It really seems unnecessary to make a remark upon this paragraph, the tendency of which is obvious; and which, upon the very ground it takes, beats itself, for it confesses "that the box was advantageously placed for the view of the audience."

With respect to the box, it was selected by the Managers, and we have little doubt, but that if His Majesty visits Drury Lane again, he will choose to sit somewhere else; for the box has this particular disadvantage, it is impossible to see any thing from it but the front of the lamps and the backs of the actors. Ill-natured and illiberal people say, that the Managers. calculated, that by fitting up any of the public boxes for His Majesty and suite, they should lose the profits arising from their occupation by individuals, because into this Committee Box the public could not conveniently have been admitted; and that that therefore was appropriated to His Majesty. But the truth is, that had His Majesty sat in the public stage-box, it will be evident to those who know the shape of the Theatre, that he would have sat with his back to the Audience.

The Old Times, however, must have been woefully disappointed at seeing the King, next evening, at Covent Garden, sitting in the public boxes, precisely in the same situation as that in which, in the old Theatre, his Royal Father was wont to sit. The accommodation for the King at Covent Garden wasample and elegant, and formed a striking contrast to the uncomfortable and inconvenient arrangement at the other House.

With respect to the assertion in the Old Times, that the military were very numerous, we merely state, that the escort was not nearly so large as that it which accompanied the late King on similar occas-

Bostow.- A melancholy accident happened on Thursday se'nnight, on our coast, by the sinking of the vessel Two Brothers, Capt. Coulsen, in seven fathoms water. The gamekeeper, being a constable, produced his authority to apprehend him, and a pistol to intimidate him into compliance. The poacher, however, resolutely defied the keeper, awearing he would not be taken alive. The latter, at feeling intrified in pains the nitted them is not possible intrified in pains the nitted them is nave, and not feeling justified in using the pistol, threw it away, and closed with the other. A desperate struggle ensued, when the gamekeeper, seizing a paddle, struck the poacher over the head and brought him to the ground. fell upon a heap of quick-lime, which lay like snow upon the ground, and before the accident was discovered, the poor in-fant was literally burnt to death. The unconscious father was the first to remove the body, and on clearing the features from the lime, discovered to his astonishment and dismuy that it was his own child, and sunk insensible to the ground.

DUBLIN.—A dreadful affray took place at Templemore Barracks, on Sunday, the 4th Feb. An officer, with a serjeant, corporal, and 12 men, went out to selze a still about four miles from Roscrea. They made their seizure good; but on their return, were attacked when entering a gate in a narrow defile, by about four or five hundred ragged ruffians, who were waiting in ambuscade for the party. They rushed so suddenly upon our men, that seven of them were pinioned, and their arms were taken from them in a trice; but the serjeant, a gallant stout fellow, although run through the lungs by a bayonet, and having a finger shot off, rallied with his seven remaining firelocks, and completely beat the assailants off the field, leaving four killed and nineteen wounded :- several of our men being wounded severely, but none mortally; though these pitchforks, their general weapons, inflict wounds of a sad de-

NORTHAMPTON.-G. W. F. Hatton, Esq. of Kerby Hall, met with a serious accident on Monday as he was leaping a spirited hunter ones a hedge, when the reins broke, and Mr, Hatton falling on his head, disconted his collar-bone. Norwich.—On Saturday sen'night as Leeds, the Cotisbal Carrier, was returning from our city, a man approached his cart on the road near the mile stone at Catton-the carrier, supstopped his horse and learned forward, when the villain instantly seized hold of his coat and dragged him out of the cart, two other men then rushed upon Leeds and assisted in holding him down; they took from him a purse containing four one pound notes and some silver, and a poeket book.

Last week, Barney Clark, a most notorious character, and James Wright, who were committed to our goal for uttering and having forged notes in their possession, made two attempts to break prison by getting up the chimney of the room, in which they were confined during the evening, but it being well secured they were unable to make their escape that way. Mr. King as usual locked them up into their cells, without taking the least notice of what had passed, and in the morning sent for a smith, when on cutting the list which was wound round their irons, they immediately fell on the ground; they were afterwards more securely ironed.

Wellington.—On Friday se'unight, the colliers in this neighbourhood struck work, and manifested a disposition to outrage and violence, it was necessary to summon a part of the Yeomanry from Shrewsbury. The summons was attended with the greatest alacrity, and a troop soon arrived at the spot where the greatest disturbance prevailed; the Magistrates in attendance read the Riot Act, and endeavoured in vain to conciliate the rioters,—they became more violent, and it was necessary, from the altacks made upon the Yeomstory, and the determination to rescue the prisoners, to fire upon the rioters. One men was, we lament to say, consequently killed, and two were wounded. Six prisoners were secured and lodged in Shrewsbury Gaol.

ACCIDENTS. OFFENCES. &c.

At day break on Sunday morning a thief broke into the house of Mr. Walsh, in Whitecrossistreet, St. Luke's, and made his way to the bed-room of Miss Walsh; she was much alarmed, and on looking about, saw a huge fellow in the act of rummaging a chest of drawers, and packing up the contents to carry off. She screamed aloud, and the fellow instantly other implements of house-breaking. The robber effected his escape without being able to carry off the plunder.

Outrage of a Gang of Robbers.—A carayan, containing number of convicts from Newgute, destined for Sheerness, a number of convicts from Newgute, destined for Sheerness, was attacked on Monday night, on the Sarrey side of Blackfriars Bridge, by a set of robbers, with the view of rescuing the notorious "Rescue Gang." They assailed the Lancers who were escorting the caravan, and wounded one of them severely with a large stone, and broke the windows of the chaise in which Mr. Brown the gaoler, was accompanying them. The villeis escented them. The villains escaped.

The house of Mr. Twining, at Hampton, was broken into on Saturday night the 3d instant. The thieves must have been several hours in the house, and they took away every portable article. They even took the silver edges off casto and left the plated part. Mr. Twining heard a noise in the house, but supposed it to be the butler from whom it proceeded.

the return of His Majesty to Carlton House on Wednesday night, a serious accident occurred as the cavalcade was passing down Long-acre. Owing to the slippery state of the pavement, the horse of one of the Life Guardsmen fell, and the rider was thrown to the ground. Some of his companions, in their rapid career, unavoidably rode over him.

LONDON MARKEIN.

CORN EXCHANGE, FRIDAY, TEB. S. There has been a large arrival of Grain in general this w and the trade on the whole is dull.—WHEAT, of which there has been some quantity fresh up since Monday, in addition to a considerable part of that day's arrival which remained over on account of its inferior quality, met a heavy sale to-day on lower terms.—BARLEY is also rather cheaper, particularly for the ordinary qualities; and the OAT trade is full 1s. per quarter lower, the arrivat his week having been large.—In BRANS and PRASE there is no alteration.

RI.ING'S LACE (of the real Point and Brussels fabrie), 147, Strand, near Somerset House, removed from 392, Strand.— G.F. URLING and CO, beg to inform the Fashionable World, that G. F. URLING and GO, beg to inform the Fashionable World, that they have prepared for the Season a various and extensive Assortment of their PATENT LACE DRESSES, from three Guineas to one kundred Guineas each; some of which, from recent improvements, they humbly presume to compare with the most perfect foreign productions. Also a great variety of Veils, Seaffs, Squares, Laces, Nets, &c. of exery description. This peculiarly clear and transparent Article having, in the higher circles, superseded the use of common Lace, which becomes rough and full of fibre on the first wasning, the Patentees respectfully apprise the Public, that the latter is frequently starched to conceal its defects, and make it resemble Urling's Lace, which, therefore, can only be relied upon as genuine at their Wholesale and Retail Establishment. In London, or of the Country Dealers supplied by them. Every Article is distinguished by a Seai, with the Patentee's Initials, "G. F. U. and Co." and the words, "by the (late) Queen's authority." Specimens, shewing the superiority of Urling's Lace over common Lace, may be seen in Ackermann's Repository, La Belle Assemblee, and other fashionable works, and may be had gratis, by application, post-paid, to G. F. Ulring and Co.

Country Dealer's supplied upon the most liberal terms.—Manufactory Basford, Natimehand.

THE ARMY.

A hope is entertained that the Veteran Battalions will not be disbanded before the King's Coronation, when they will partake of a very distinguished act of favour, which, we understand, is in contemplation for the occasion. A year's extra service is to be allowed to the whole of the Army on that day, which will entitle many a soldier to an augmentation of pea-

The 3d Regiment of Guards are ordered to Plymouth from Portsmouth.

The Garrison of Plymouth consists, at present, of the 5th Royal Veteran Battalion, six companies of the 9th Royal Veteran Battalion, under the command of Lieut.-Col. Twigg, and the 84th Regiment, commanded by Lieut.-Col. Daubeny. The 11th Regiment, which lately arrived from Gibraltar, under the command of Major Campbell, occupies, for the present, Stonehouse Barracks. The 12th Regiment is also expected at Plymouth.

The following Officers of the Army, who have passed through their course of studies at the Royal Military College, underwent a public examination before the Board of Commissioners, which assembled at the late Christmas vacation; viz. Captain Allen, 64th Regiment; Captain Williams, 85th Regiment; Lieut. Browne, 9th Dragoons (Luncers); Lieut. Pigott, 14th Foot; Lieut. Stevens, 98th Foot.

The result of the examination was very creditable to each of them. Their demonstrations in the higher branches of geometry, spherical trigonometry, conic sections, and in the science of fortification, &c. particularly evinced their individual talents and sedulous application to study, and merited the unqualified approbation of the Board of Commissioners, which was communicated to them by an address from the Governor, in which he also took an opportunity of adverting to their uniform correctness of conduct during the period of their stay at the College.

The Supreme Board consisted of the following Members:-Generals Earl Cathcart; Sir Hildebrand Onkes: Sir Lowry Cole; Sir H. Fane; Sir Harry Calvert; Sir Willoughby Gordon, the Quartermaster General; Sir George Murray, the Governor; and of Colonel Butter, the Lieutenant Governor of the College. There were also present, Major-Generals Sir Denis commanding the Western District; Sir A. Campbell, Portuguese service; Sir Henry Harding; Sir George Scovell; Colonel M.Dermott, &c. The attendance of the Duke of Wellington had been expected, but he was prevented; as was likewise his Royal Highness the Duke of York, and the Adju-

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS. MONDAY.

On the motion of the Earl of Rosslyn, the order for summoning their Lordships on the motion of Earl Grey respecting the state of Naples, with reference to the Holy Alliance, was discharged and fixed for Monday next. TUESDAY.

The Longitude Bill was read a second time. WEDNESDAY. The Longitude Bill went through a Committee.

THURSDAY. The Queen's Annuity Bill was brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

FRIDAY. The Earl of Rosslyn in the absence of the Marquis of Landsdown, postponed the motion of the Noble Marquis for a Committee on Foreign Trade to Wednesday. The Duke of Bedford presented a petition from the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London, in favour of the Queen.

The Longitude Bill was passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. MONDAY.

Major Gen. Wilson presented a petition from the rope-makers of the Metropolis, describing their distressed situation, and principally complaining of "the Devil," a machine which with the aid of seven men now performed the labour heretofore requiring the exertions of twenty-seven men. It was laid on the table.

Mr. Gooch gave notice, that he should on the 1st of March, move for a Committee to enquire into the present state of the agricultural distresses.

Lord J. Russell moved the House to go into a Committee on the Grampound Disfranchisement Bill. The Noble Lord observed, that twelve of the largest towns in Great Britain were without elective franchise. York was but inadequately represented, he thought it desirable to transfer the privilege possessed by Grampound to some of these towns, or to give it in aid of the County Representation.

Mr. Martin (Galway) opposed the motion, and observed, Grampound.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow on the contrary believed, that borough to be incurable, and therefore was for dispossessing the electors of their franchise.

Mr. T. Wilson considered that to correct defects in the Constitution by these means, was much better than any sweeping plan of reform.

r. Lockhart was disposed to give a larger basis to the representation of property and numbers. He was not, however, prepared to say how the franchise ought to be disposed of, but had no hesitation in voting for the disfrauchisement of the Borough.

Mr. Grenfell was anxious to support the Bill.

Sir J. Newport had no difficulty in disfranchising the borough, but could not say to where the franchise should be

Mr. D. Gilbert thought, that if the franchise were trans ferred from Grampound, it would be most expedient to give it to the adjacent Hundreds. He moved an instruction to the Committee to that effect.

Mr. Phillips thought wealth, population and commerce ought to be represented—the county of Cornwall sent forty-four members to Parliament, which was the eleventh part of the whole population, while Lancashire only sent a thirty-fifth part of the representation and contained a twelfth part of the population. Thus Cornwall sent one member to Parliament for every five thousand—Lancashire one to every sixty thousand, and Yorkshire one to every thirty-three thousand; now the wealth of Cornwall in respect to the other counties was as one to fifteen, the property of that county was one fifty-fourth part of the real property of England. He thought, therefore, that the elective franchise should be transferred to some lurge and populous manufacturing town.

Mr. H. Gurney supported the Bill.

The Jon. Mr. Ward in supporting the Bill, did not consider himself pledged to support reform. With respect to the suggestion of the Hon. Member (Mr. Gilbert) for transferring the franchise to the adjacent hundreds, as well might (should be Directors of the Bank be hereafter convicted of corruption) the inhabitants of Threadneedle-street be called in to become Directors.

Mr. W. Wynn thought, that by extending the franchise to Yorkshire, one great inconvenience would be got rid of, namely, the electors would be better enabled to vote; the time at pre-sent allowed by law, and the extent of the county, operating to preclude them.

Mr. F. Robinson was disposed to prefer the suggestion of the Hon. Gent. (Mr. Gilbert).

Mr. Westers approved of the intention of bestowing the elective franchise on Yerkshire.

Mr. Wilmot supported the Bill.

Mr. R. Bathurst was anxious that the remedy for the grievances about to be adopted by the House, should be a practical one. The measure, he thought, ought to operate in terrorem, and that the objects which the House had in view could be best accomplished by limiting the forfeited franchises to the surrounding hundreds.

Mr. Lyttleton supported the Bill, as did Mr. Douglas, and then Lord J. Russell replied.

The proposition of Mr. D. Gilbert was put and negatived without a division.

Mr. Beaumont then proposed to extend the franchise to the County of York, to enable that county to send four Members to Parliament, and of giving that right to the West Riding.

Mr. S. Wortley thought the county of York was not fairly entitled to the preference. It was a mistake to suppose Yorkshire contained the largest number of voters, that number being only 26,000, while Lancashire contained 60,000. He, however, would vote for extending the franchise to Lerds, though be thought the claims of Manchester were equally as strong.

Mr. Alderman Heggate was for extending the privilege of the franchise to Leeds.

After some further observations, the House divided on Mr. Beaumont's amendment-For the original motion, 136-For the amendment, 68—Majority, 70.

The House then went into a Committee, and the Report was afterwards received.

In a Committee on the Queen's Annuity Bill, the Blank for the Annual Income was filled up with the sum of 50,000l.

To the largeness of this sum, Mr. Alderman Smith objected as being dangerous to be entrusted in such hands; for it might be used for injurious purposes. Some conversation ensued, in respect to that sum "barring her dower."-The clause was agreed to, as originally proposed.

TUESDAY. The following Members were chosen to try the merits of the petition against the Returns for Tregony and Hedon. For the former place - D. Carr, J. Dunlop, J. D. Astell, W. Wyndham, C. W. Sibthorpe, J. H. Lowther, J. Collinson, E. Rogers, W. Duncombe, H. Bright, J. Mansfield, C. Dundas, Esqrs, Sir J. T. Stanley, Sir W. Guise, Sir P. Pole. For the latter place, W. Lewis, R. Frankland, E. Hornby, G. P. Jervolse, J. Franklin, C. Pelham, L. Concannon, C. Tulk, H. Hamilton, L. Lester, T. S. Rice, R. Smith, Esqrs. Lord G. Beresford, Lord Althorne.

Petitions were presented from the Livery of London, St. Anne's, Limehouse, St. Luke's, Bromley, Rye, and a variety of other places, in favour of the Queen. Major-General Wilson asked whether Government were in possession of any Copies of any Declaration or Manifesto made on the part of the Holy Alliance against the Kingdom of Naples, and of their hostile intentions in respect of the latter Power.

Lord Castlereagh replied in the negative; and Sir J. Macintosh then postponed his motion on the subject till Wednesday next, (the 21st inst.)

Dr. Lushington presented a petition signed by ten clergymen of the Established Church, praying for the restoration of the Queen's name to the Liturgy, the emission of which they

Mr. Harbord took occasion to condemn the practice of introducing politics into the pulpit.

Mr. Hebhouse presented three petitions on the same subject, from St. Andrews, Holborn. In the course of the observations which the Hon. Gent. made, he adverted to the early life of Lord Castlerengh, and read a letter, signed by the Noble Lord in 1790, said the Noble Lord had undertaken to advocate the cause of Reform; and he would say to the Noble Lord, in the language of Pym to Lord Strafford, that the people would never leave him while he had a head on his shoulders, though he (Mr. H.) neither wanted his head nor his place. He hope Ministers would take warning, and begin the work of conciliation.

Lord Castlereagh in reply to the observations of the Hon. Member said, the paper in question referred to a reform in the that at the two last elections, no bribery had taken place at | Commons; and he admitted that if the Irish Parliament now existed with the same state of things as when he subscribed that paper, he would support a Bill for the reform of that Parliament, though he believed he should never arrive at that standard of excellence which the Hon. Member prided himself on, viz. Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage.

Sir J. Newport with some warmth declared, that the Noble Lord supported Reform till he got into place, and then supported it no longer. He felt convinced, that the measures of the Noble Lord would bring the country to destruction.

Lord Castlereagh said he should not break his heart because the Right Hon. Baronet did not approve of his measures, and he was sorry that he (Sir J.) had on the present occasion got himself into a scrape. With respect however to his advocating Reform, be (Lord C.) had publicly declared five years before he With respect however to his advocating took office, that he should not advocate Reform.

Sir J. Newport in explanation charged the Noble Lord with having done much to render the House venal and corrupt.

Lord Castlereagh to order, asked whether such language was to be tolerated. He considered the attack of the liou. Member an unworthy subterfuge.

The petition was laid on the table.

Mr. J. Smith then rose to bring

Mr. J. Smith then rose to bring forward a motion for re-storing the Queen's name to the Liturgy. He said he had never been able to understand the reasons why Ministers refused to insert the Queen's name. He would have rejected if her Majesty had remained abroad, for then the country would have been saved much agitation. He considered the rumours affoat as calumnies on her Majesty—he then deprecated the proceedings of Ministers, went over the ground in that respect which has so often been beat, and considered the decision of those Peers who voted for the Bill as the result of a false view of the subject and placing implicit confidence in Government. He illustrated his position by relating an anecdote of a Member of this House, who, on being repronched for not attending to the debate, but to his wine, observed, "Oh! I don't trouble myself about the matter, Mr. Pitt takes care of that for me." Many Peers he was afraid were in the same predicament on this question. The Hon. Gentleman then said, that his object in submitting the motion was to put an end thereby to the disturbances and distraction of the country. He then alluded to the procession to St. Paul's, which had made a great impression on his mind and induced him to suppose that the countres multitudes then assembled would accomplish any thing. After a variety of remarks similar in effect, he concluded with moving the following Resolutions:—" This House having taken into consideration the circumstance of her Majesty's name not being inserted in the Prayers, Collects, and Litanies of the Church service, and also the numerous Petitions from the people, complaining of the omission, is of opinion that it is highly expedient, under all existing circumstances, that her Majesty's name should be now inserted in all Prayers, Collects, and Litanies aforesaid, and that such a measure would greatly tend to remove the discontents existing on that subject in the public mind."

The motion led to some discussion in which none of the Ministers took part. The only Speakers in support of it were, Mr. Charles Tennyson, Lord Milton, Sir J. Newport, Mr. W. Lamb, Mr. Wilberforce. On the other hand, it was opposed by Mr. Legge, Mr. C. Wynn, Mr. S. Wortley, Mr. R. Martin, Mr.

Wilmot, Sir T. Acland, Mr. Davenport, Mr. Alderman Bridges.
Those Members who opposed the Motion went on the principle that the Queen's conduct had been such as not to entitle her to any favour, and that with respect to inserting her name in the Liturgy, there was nothing to warrant a departure from the course Ministers and recommended.

On the other side, those who supported the Motion repeated the charge of persecution and suborning of witnesses.

Mr. Wilberforce was disposed to vote for the Motion purely with a view to tranquillize the country. He fully acquitted Ministers, and was of opinion no blame could attach to them. He could not but think that her Majesty, in adopting sentiments so unlike the tone and language which she had used in replying to the address of that House, had shown none of the respect due to the Constitution of Parliament and to the established laws of the country. Whatever excuse he might be ready to make, still it must be admitted that the reiteration of uch sentiments went to violate the constitution, and were as injurious to the public as they were dishonourable to herself. When he supported the motion, he supported it, therefore, for the sake of the country, and for no other reason. He looked to the effect which was to be produced on the bulk of the middle and lower classe, who were nt present left open to the assaults and seductions of mischievous men, who lost no opportunity of creating public confusion. Let not the House con-ceive, that to yield to the present motion was to declare a belief of the innocence of the Queen. With him (Mr. Wilberforce) the innocence or guilt of her Majesty weighed not a feather. Independently of any feeling upon that point, he would vote for the metion, because he thought that its success would go to tranquillize the country: if it would not at once restore peace and harmony to the kingdom, it would at least remove one cause of the content—one cause perhaps of many, but certainly a cause of very considerable weight. The conduct of her Majesty he was free to say had not been proved such as to entitle her to any mark of grace or to any dignity. But he would not come to a vote of that description. But as the country wished for the restoration of the Queen's name to the Liturgy he was disposed to gratify them, and doing this he was of opinion that they should best consult the peace and well being of the country.

On a division the numbers were for the Motion, 178.—Against -Majority for Ministers, 130.

The Grampound Disfranchisement Bill went through a Committee—the Report was ordered to be further considered on Friday sen'night.

Mr. Hobhouse gave notice, on the part of his Hon. Colleague that he should on the 15th of May submit a Motion relative to the transactions which took place at Manchester on the 16th of August, 1819.

WEDNESDAY

Mr. H. Sumner gave notice, that he should, on Wednesday next, move for a Select Committee to inquire into the state of the Orphan's Fund.

On the motion of Mr. Serjeant Onslow, a Select Committee were appointed to inquire into the Laws respecting the Regulations for Admission of Attornies and Solicitors to practice, and to make certain alterations therein.

In answer to a question from Gen. Gascoyne, who asked, whether it was intended to extend the time for allowing the im portation of timber, Mr. Wallace replied, that it was desirable the time should not be prolonged beyond July. A petition was presented from certain ship-ewners of Leith. connected with the coal trade, complaining that the trade in that district was nearly annihilated, in consequence of the restrictions of 1816.—The petition was laid on the table.

Mr. Beaumont called the attention of the House to the conict of Sheriffs with reference to county meetings, particularly of the Sheriff of Obeshire, who had refused to put an amend-ment. He proposed to introduce a legislative measure for pre-venting such practices in future. He then referred to another instance in Northumberland, where the Sheriff had refused to call a meeting, though the requisition was respectably and regularly sign ed; so that it would seem, the county, by these means, was deprived of the exercise of its legal right. He moved that the petition of the freeholders of Chester be referred to a School Committee.

After some conversation between Mr. Davenport, Mr. Creevey, Lord Casalere gh, (who thought that the notice of a motion by Mr. Creeves was similar in effect,) the motion was, for the present, withdrawn.

Mr. Kennedy moved for leave to bring in a Bill for regulating the Appointment of Juries for the Trial of Criminal Causes in Scotland. His object was to assimilate the Scotch law, in this respect, to that of England:

Lord Binning admitted the necessity of regulations and improvements.—Leg se was given.

Mr. Curteis, alkading to a notice which he had observed in the London Gazettr of last week, calling for tenders for contracts for a supply of American corn for the British Colonies, suggested, that it would be more desirable that these contracts suggested, that it would be more destraine that the contracts should be made in British corn, which was, in every point of view, superior to foreign. He then moved "for the production of Returns from His Majesty's Victualling Office, of all Corn and Flour furnished to our American Colonies, from the United States of America, as well as other foreign places, stating the amount and prices of the contracts for the same, for the last three years."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer in answer to the observations of the Hon. Gentleman said, that during the war in the American Colonies, it was necessary to pressure corn for the Military Garrisons from the nearest places. Latterly the Colonies had been supplied from Great Britain, unfortunately, however, Government had received information from the West Indies, that the flour had spoiled in the carriage and was con-demned. The Commanders in the Colonics had recommended American flour as good, and orders were given for a supply. Orders had since been given to the Victualing Office to send British flour for the supply, taking care to select that fit for transit, and to see it properly packed.

The motion was agreed to.
On the second reading of the Malt Duties Bill, Mr. Creevey objected to its further progress as the House were not in pos session of a single estimate on any of the public services of the Colonel Davis opposed it on the same grounds.

The Chancellor of the Eschequer had no wish to press the services before the estimates were laid on the table.

Some further conversation took place, in the course of which, Mr. Hume opposed the further progress of the Bill; as did Sir J. Newport and Mr. J. Martin. The House divided. For the second rending, 71-Against it, 22. The Bill was then read a second time.

In a Committee of the whole House, on the Acis for regulating the Office of the Muster of the Rolls in Ireland.

Mr. C. Grant moved Resolutions for enabling His Majesty to grant compensations to individuals whose offices were abolished; to the Master of the Rolls a salary of 4,000l.; and to a Master of Chancery in ordinary retiring, after twenty years' service, or in consequence of ill health, 1,5001.

A resolution was then moved, suggesting a grant of 1,2801. to the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, in lieu of a sulary of 7001, to which he was entitled, and grants of 4001, to his head clerk, 1001, to his second, and 801, to his third,— Resolutions were then adopted recommending a Grant of 10,0001. to the present Masters in Chancery, Six Clerks, and other Officers, as compensation for losses sustained in consequence of the new regulations; and recommending compensation to be made to the Registrar of the Court of Chancery, and the Cierk and Usher of the Court.

The House resumed, and the Report of the Committee was ordered to be received to-morrow. - Adjourned.

THURSDAY.

The following were appointed on the Committee to try the merits of the petition, complaining of an undue return for Boston:—Hoa. J. S. Cocks, J. Rnine, C. Calvert, J. M. Clements, P. Corbett, W. L. Childs, W. G. Bouten, Hon. H. Legge, C. H. Hutchinson, Esgs.; Sir H. Pringle, Sir U. Burgh, Sir K. Powell; Lord G. Kitsrov.—Nomineed Sir R. Haron Geo. Guerran Lord G. Fitzroy.—Nominees, Sir R. Heron, Gen. Gascoyne.

The Bill for authorizing the building of four new chapels of ease in the parish of St. Mary-le-bone, was read a first and second time.

In a Committee on the Court of Sessions Act of Scotland, a series of resolutions were agreed to, for regulating the salaries of the Clerks. The Chief Clerk's salary was fixed at 600l, per annum; the next in rotation at 3001. &c.

Mr. Warre called the attention of the House to the case of the Bowditches, charged with the forcible abduction of Miss. Maria Glenn, in Dorsetshire, two years since, and convicted on the oaths of herself and servant, and sentenced to be imprisoned. Miss Glenn had since been convicted of wilful perjury in this case, and it was clearly proved that this family had been falsely accused. With a view to afford them relief, the Hon. Gent. moved that their petition to the Home Departmentpresented in October last, be laid before the House.

Mr. Clive and Lord Castlereagh said, that every attention had been afforded to the petitioners which the case allowed, and after some further conversation, Mr. Warre withdraw his Lord A. Hamilton moved for "a copy of the Order in Council transmitted to the Moderator of the General Assembly of Scotland; and for a Copy of the Letter or Letters addressed by Lord Sidmouth to Colonel Gordon, of the Kirkcubright Yeomanry Cavalry, or to the Lord Lieutenant of the County, relative to the arrest of William Gillespie, the Officiating Clergyman to the Corps." The Noble Lord prefaced his motion by descanting on the independence of the Church of Scotland, and detailed the facts of the case, which were shortly; that in preadle ing before the corps, the Ministeria question had prayed for the. Queen, on which the Colonel ordered him to be arrested, sominally, and told him he must not leave the county. He called upon the House to do the injured party justice.

Lord Glenorchy seconded the motion.

The Lord Advocate of Scotland contended, that the Order in Council, under which Colonel Gordon acted, was grounded on Acts of Parliament, and on the recognized laws of the country. Wi'n respect to the difference between the parties, he (the Lord Advocate) had consented to become umpire; he had, in ermequence, entered upon the necessary inquiries, but had not yet made his award.

Sir J. Macintook took a view of the establishment of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and was of opinion with respect to the case in question, that the object of the Order in Council, was to prevent the Clergy from praying for her Majesty. He admitted, that the interests of the parties could not be in better hands than that of the Lord Advocate; there could not be a more judicious or honourable umpire living.

Lord Cauthereagh protested against the doctrine of making Government administer the law between private individuals, when the legal tribunals of the country were open to them.

Mr. J. P. Grant and Mr. Maxwell supported the motion

After which the House divided. For the motion, 35-Against it, 110.

Mr. C. Grant obtained leave to bring in a Bill to regulate the fees of the Officers at the Courts of King Bouch, Common Pleas and Court of Exchequer (Pleas side) in Ireland.

On the motion for going into a Committee to consider the propriety of granting a compensation to the Clerks of the Court of Admiralty in Scotland, and for the abelition of their offices.

Mr. Creevey objected to the going into the Committee without stating why the grunt was called for, and divided the House. For the motion, 22—Against it, 59. The House then went into the Committee, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY.

On the second reading of the Newington Church Bill, it was opposed by Mr. Dennison, Major-Gen. Wilson, &c. on the ground that the petitioners against the Bill had not had proper notice.—After some conversation, the Bill was ordered for a second reading this day fortight. second rending this day fortnight.

Mr. Kennedy brought in a Bill to alter the mode of choosing Juries in Scotland, which, after some observations from the Lord Advocate, was read a first time, and ordered for a second reading on Thursday next.

Mr. Lennard moved for an account of the Salaries of the Officers of the British Museum, with a statement of the extent of their Services, &c. with a view to make certain regulations in the Establishment, and to give greater facilities to the admission of the Public into the Museum.

Mr. C. Long declared that every facility had been given for inspection to the general contents of the Museum.- The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Hume entered into a history of the Ordunace departmeat, and the expenses attending that branch of the Executive; he contended that it was highly necessary to adopt economy. He went through a variety of items to show that his ideas might be carried into effect, and concluded by moving For the Copy of a certain Ledger recommended by the Commissioners for Military Inquiry; the Ordanace Estimates of Great Britain and Ireland, with minute details, distinguishing the salaries and allowances of Civil Officers; an account of the expenses for each year, and the total of the whole, in separate columns, from the year 1793 to the present time."

Mr. R. Ward replied to the observations, desied the correctness of the Hon. Gentleman's statements, and stated that many reductions had taken place in the offices alluded to. House divided on Mr. Home's motion. For the motion, 44— Against it, 58-Majority, 14.

On our return to the gallery, we found Mr. Hume moving that an Account of the actual expenditure of the Ordnauce Department, extracted from the Expense Ledger, he laid before the House on the 15th of April, if the House be then sitting; and if not, within ten days after its meeting.

Mr. Hume also moved, that there be laid before the House an account of the amount of all Pensions, Allowances and Emoluments granted under the 50th of George III. chap. 17, to superannuated Officers and Officers' Widows.—Ordered.—Ad-

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are obliged to Tenax, but he must be aware that the al-Insiens to Mr. Smith's intended motion are somewhat too late. We have no room for the statements of Messre. Lockhart and Scott, which would, if fairly given, occupy half the Paper.

We thank Oxoniensis; - his postscript might kave safely been spared: we have no fault to find with his communication but its length. The same objection applies to the letter from the "Truly Loyal Female;" besides which, irony with the Queen can do no good.—Facts, plain and unanswerable, are the weapone to use in the cause of Justice—we leave calling of names to other Papers, and satisfy ourselves with qualifying persons for the epithets which our contemporaries choose to bestow upon them.

Little Miss Bull is as get too little for usglad to hear from her when she grows a little bigger.

For though their notes with pleasure fills one,

We have heard of native Oysters at this season, but native

We have no doubt that it is all fair and reasonable; but, as we think that a more detectable unisance does not exist than the present London Bridge either to go under or over, we should be the first to advocate its speedy demolition. Besides which, we differ entirely as to the waste of money in improvements; surely the circula-tion of money amongst the labouring classes must be beneficial to them. And, as for the country not being able to bear the expence of building London Bridge, we have little doubt that half a dozen merchants, not in the Corporation, would un-dertake the whole affair without troubling the country at all, and be glad of the job into the bargain. It has been confidently, though not confidentially mentioned to us, whence the con munication we allude to comes: we confess we cannot believe We must add, however, that we might have been inclined to have admitted the queries, and have made our remarks upon them; but the line, "that the insertion of them would help the sale of our Puper at this time? put an end to that: we solemnly declare, that unloss our hearts and minds go with it, we never will suffer a line to appear in our pages. The sale of our Paper is no object, for this reason; if the Paper fails in its sale, it fails in the aim we have of circulating truth, and we would as soon stop it as go on; but while, by the force of truth the paper is a sale, it fails in the aim we have of circulating truth, and we would as soon stop it as go on; but while, by the force of the sale of the truth the force we then the sale of the truth the sale of the sale of the truth the sale of the sale of the sale of the truth the sale of truth alone, we find ourselves, in eight weeks from our start, the second Sunday Paper (numerically speaking), it is not the hope of selling a few Papers more, or the fear of selling many less, that can induce us to admit that which is not in

We have during the last week experienced a slight depression in the funds, as might have been anticipated, yet they present an appearance of elasticity, notwithstanding the attempts of some parties to depress them. Consols opened yesterday morning at 721 for money, and 722 for the account; there was a good deal of business done in the course of the day, and at the close of the market, the prices were as above.

A Monday's Edition, containing the latest News, the Stock List, the London Markets, and the State of the Country Markets by that morning's post, is published at Three o'clock.

The Subscribers are informed that Nos. 2, and 3, are now Re-printed, and that Nos. 1, and 4, will be ready on Thursday next, Nos. 5, and 6, will immediately follow.

JOHN BULL.

LONDON, FEB. 18.

THE poor QUEEN! so we called her a fortnight ago: last week rendered her still poorer; thus the affairs of the past week entitle her to the epithet of poorest; and, if matters go on at the same rate for a few days longer, we shall be at a loss for words to represent her forlorn condition.

The great effort in her favour was made on Tuesday night last by a certain Mr. Smith, whether Mr. James Smith of Austin Friars, we know not, but certainly by a Mr. Smith, who appears not much more prudent than that unhappy abjurer of JOHN BULL.

After a long debate, remarkable in no way, except for the silence of Mr. Brougham and Mr. Denman, a proposition for placing her Majesty's name in the Liturgy was negatived by an overwhelming majority of Two HUNDRED AND NINETY-BIGHT to One Hundred and Seventy-eight.

If any thing were wanting to shew that the idea of the Queen's purity is utterly abandoned, and that the question is become a mere struggle of the Whige for political power, the fact would be incontrovertibly established by the number and names which compose the minority.

When Mr. Tierney made, in the year 1819, a motion avowedly for the intention of turning out the Ministers, the Whig minority was the Hundred and Seventy-eight. When Lord Tavistock moved the other day a censure on his Majesty's Ministers, which would have removed them from their offices, the Whig minority was One Hundred and Seventy-eight; and, on this last occasion, when the Queen's interests were the osfensible object of the party, the Whig minority was still Orn HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-RIGHT.

And, upon examination of the lists of all those minorities, so marvellously accordant in numbers, it will he found that the names are, with some few variations. those of the same excellent and patriotic Whigs-

" There is something more in this than natural, if philosophy could find it out."

But without any great stretch of philosophy, the people of England will probably find out by it that the Queen is a cat's-paw, and her purity a pretence.

One variety indeed the last debate afforded:-Mr. Wilberforce, that holy little man-who laboured, during the former discussions, under such violent oscillations of mind that he could neither vote, that it was inexpedient to leave her name out of the Liturgy, or that Ministers were censurable for doing so had so completely " screwed his courage to the sticking-place," that he, on the third debate, found his mind sufficiently composed to affirm that the sacred name of Caroline ought to be introduced into the Church service; and, that the communion of the people of England with their Maker should be interrupted by a name, the very sound of which, in the Holy places, would remind every heater of the Tent Scene, and the Bed Scene, and the Caleche Scene, and the Bottle Scene, and the Bath Scene, and the Adam and Eve Scene, and the Masquerade Scene, and the Automaton Scene, and all the other horrors, which it would shock one to be reminded of, even in the loosest or most thoughtless society.

We believe Mr. Wilberforce to be a well-meaning Christian; but we have no respect for the strength of his character, or the firmness of his mind: in his best days he was not remarkable for either; in his latter years his vascillation, indecision, and inconsistency have been notorious and lamentable; but still we were fond of attributing them to a benevolent weakness, and to a timid conscience. Whether we are to continue to him the same indulgent consideration will depend upon the explanation which he may give of his speech and conduct attributed to him on the late occasion. We will put two or three questions to him:

Do you, Mr. Wilberforce, believe the Queen to be innocent? No shuffling-no subterfuge-YES or No?

If you do believe her innocent, Why have you not boldly, and manfully, and generously supported this injured innocence? Why have you hesitated to pay her your personal homage; to help her with your political support; to absolve her, by the verdict of your private approbation?

But, if you believe her guilty, how can you reconcile it with your sense of decency and religion, to introduce that guilty one to the altars of GoD as an object of honour and devotion; to introduce a name so scandalized and stigmatized into the most sacred of duties, and into the holiest of places; and to turn the House of God into a school of schism, a kind of debating society, in which, when the Queen's name was pronounced from the desk of the preacher, the thoughts of all the hearers would be called away from their devotions to an examination of the evidences of Sacchi and Cucchi, of Hownam and of Flynn?

We should like to hear from Mr. Wilberforce a plain answer to those very plain questions.

It is reported in the account of Mr. Wilberforce's speech, that he recommended this extraordinary proceeding not as a measure of law, nor as justice to the Queen, but as a political expedient. A political espedient! The offices of religion, a political expedient! Public worship, a political expedient! Oh, no, Mr. Reporter, your ears deceived you, or you have mis-read your short-hand: Mr. Wilberforce, the head and leader of the saints and confessors of our age, could never have uttered such a profanation. He who is so strict as to look upon cards as an abomination; who thinks, as we are informed, that the playhouse is the temple of Satan, he never could have proposed that she who slept thirtyfive nights in a close tent with an Italian Courier, she who appeared at a masquerade in the character of Naked Truth, she who performed the part of an Automaton is a farce, she who gloated on the infidel obscenities of the Turk, she who with worse than Popish superstitle created herself into a new saint, that saint being herself -she who bivouseked under the walls of Jerusalem in order that [abomination of abominations!] she might enter Jerusalem on Palm Sunday, riding on an ass-that she, she, she; should be received into the Liturgy of the Church of England, that her name should be at their morning and their evening devotions, suggested to the prostrate picty of the English nation, and that she should enjoy a degree of religious homage, which we frankly confess, we have sometimes doubted whether the best and the worthiest, and the most pious even of her sex and station, englit to receive. And all-this for a political expediency-to conciliate Mr. Fellowes-to soften Alderman Wood-to console Mr. Henry Brougham, and to justify the runaway knocks which a few Whig ladies had given at Brandenburgh House!!!

This is the season for prosecutions and indictments, and in our peculiar situation it will not be supposed that we are particularly fond of proceedings of this nature; but we do think that those who have put such doctrines into Mr. Wilberforce's mouth, are deserving of the severest animadversion; and, as the character of an emineut man is in some degree public property, we should be glad to see Mr. Wilberforce, if he has been mis-represented, vindicate before a public tribunal, his good sense-his good faith-his consistency, and his

And now to crown the whole proceedings, the Queen having been convicted in the Lords, defeated in the Commons, degraded by the Privy Council, and rejected from the Church of England, Lord Archibald Hamilton, (the brother, be it always remembered, of her only British female attendant,) brought forward on Thursday night her claims to the prayers of the Church of Scotland, and with what result? His motion was negatived by a majority of One Hundred and Two to THIRTY-FIVE! A division which in the smallness of its aggregate, and the magnitude of its comparative amount is alike decisive of the public opinion.

In the early stages of this discussion, we have seen five hundred and twenty members attending in their places, but now, so desperate is the cause of the unhappy Queen, so contemptible her claims, that not one hundred and forty thought it worth their while to attend, either to defeat or support, a last desperate effort; and, of the two hundred and one,-who, when the discussions commenced, and before the succession of debates had enlightened the public mind, voted that it was inexpedient to omit her name from the English Liturgy, only THIR. TY-FIVE were to be found to countenance her claims to insertion in the prayers of the Church of Scotland.

We leave those striking and conclusive facts to the judgment of our readers.

In the last six weeks, only one of all the Ladies of England is reported to have disgraced herself by visiting this unhappy Princes; and, in one fortnight, her hundreds of supporters bave gradually dwindled in the House of Commons to a number little greater than that which abets Mr. Creevey in his opposition to the annual Land and Malt.

In the country at large public opinion is making a similar progress; and a few weeks, perhaps a few days, will enable us to recken up the insignificant number of these who believe Caroline to be a Saint, and Creevey a Patriot.

THE QUEEN.

It is reported, and more easily believed, than any thing else we have lately heard of her Majesty, that the Queen is much indisposed in body as well as mind; and it is said, that nothing prevents her flying for ease to those happier climates which produced the Bergamis, but the unhappy pledge which she was advised to give, that she would not receive any public money: we ourselves con-fidently believe that if this entanglement (into which she was so artfully thrown) were removed, she would not remain ten days in England; and even as it is, we ven-ture to prophecy, that she will in a very short time forfeit that pledge, eat her words, take her annuity, and aban-den an odious climate, which as she emphatically says, is as fickle as its people.

MR. BROUGHAM.

Our readers will learn with astonishment, that Mr. Brougham has not yet made the least attempt at answering the queries which we put to him; but to those who have seen him, his troubled look and haggard eye betray the consciousness of the humiliating situation in which the exposure of his conduct has placed him: there have been, we hear, some sad feuds at Brookes's, and it would not at all surprize us to find that the manly and strait-forward part of the Whigs, had expelled Mr. Brougham from their society. In the meanwhile this new Knight of the Woofid Countenance is filing informations and preferring indictments against the Loyal Pfess; in hopes, perhaps, that by raising a new clatter, and starting a fresh hare to be hunted, he may turn away public attention from his own duplicity; but in this hope (if he is silly enough to entertain it), he will find himself miserably mistaken.

The folks whom he attacks are not men to be scared by the great name of the Queen, or the big words of her advocate, and they will doubtless either in defence or retaliation develope all the transactions of the prosecutor and her lawyer. If they do not, JOHN BULL will; he is a sworn enemy to all imposture; -and every affectation whether of personal or political purity, female chas-tity or gentleman-like faith; he will endeavour by every means in his power to detect and to expose.

"Mark that, Master Brougham."

The good people of Westmoreland speak, (as it is:

for when these worthy folks talk of Lawyer Brougham, any London ear which happens to be amongst them is inexpressibly shocked at hearing the great luminary of the English Bar, awkwardly designated as L'yar Brougham.

This mis-pronunciation, although it seems to us to contain no joke at all, appeared, we are told, so wonderfully pleasant to that worthy but too serious nobleman, my Lord Hutchinson, that it moved his Lordship on one occasion to the extraordinary effort of an applauding

We understand that Mr. Brougham's reply to Lord Castlereagh's personal attacks upon him the other night evinced his usual classical taste, and was admitted even by his enemies to be in the style of TACITUS!

MR. GRBY BENNETT.

All readers of public papers must know that there is a certain Mr. Henry Grey Bennett, a mighty procer in Par-liament, the professed advocate of Philanthropy and of all sorts of liberty, and particularly the Liberty of the

Our readers will have seen in our last Number a prac tical proof, that in private life this worthy patriot thinks, that the Liberty of the Press may degenerate into license when it attacks either himself or his family, and that criminal informations, which are utter abominations when directed against Whigs or Radicals, are pious, liberal, and praise-worthy, when employed to silence a poor Tory

But it may not be so generally known, that there is a character neither quite public, nor quite private, in which this amiable gentleman has appeared, namely, that of an author; and really for a professor of Philanthropy and a punisher of libels, his authorship seems of a very extraordinary and inconsistent nature.

Something more than a year ago, Mr. Bennett published a pamphlet "on the Transportation Laws, the state of the Hulks, and of the Colony of New South Wales," which this honorable pamphleteer did not hesitate to make the most serious attacks upon persons who were not only absent and unable to defend themselves, but who, as he well knew, were so distant, that the reply to his "calumnies and aspersions," (we quote the words of the injured party) could not be received in this country for a couple of years after the calumnies and aspersions were circulated in England; but Time, slow as he is, beats at last these light-heeled and light-minded gentry: and General Macquarrie-a man estimable as a soldier, as a Civil Governor, and as a man of talents, humanity and honour-has been able at last to lay before the English public his vindication against the unmanly attack of Mr. Bennett. We cannot enter into the whole discussion, but in order that our readers may be enabled to judge of the candour and spirit of the aforesaid Mr. Bennett, and of the credit to which his statements are entitled, we shall extract from General Macquarrie's pamphlet, published by Mr. Rees, a few paragraphs in which that most respectable officer expresses his opinion of the character of the Honorable Mr. Bennett.

"Had Mr. Bennett confined his accusations within the walls of Parliament, I might have found in the heat of his argument or his passions, some excuse for his VIRGLENCE and IN-VECTIVE: but as Mr. Bennett has, COOLLY and DELIBERATELY made the Press (that powerful engine of evil and of good) the vehicle for circulating, far and wide, his UNFOUNDED at-tacks, I am compelled to have recourse to the same means for repelling the SLANDER!" p. 8.

And again, upon another part of the case, General Macquarrie mentions his honorable antagonist in the following terms:-

"Having, on hearing of this part of Mr. Bennett's CALUM-NIER made every inquiry into the circumstances of the case, I am enabled, on satisfactory grounds, to declare my firm conviction, that his statement is FALSE and UNFOUNDED!!"

"The statement on this subject, like EVERY OTHER in Mr. Bennett's Pamphlet, is mixed up with WILPUL FALSEHOOD!!!"

We are curious to know what answer the Honorable Mr. Bennett will make to imputations so very directwhether he will have recourse to a criminal information as he has had against JOHN BULL, or whether he will evince that meek and Philanthropical forgiveness that he has exhibited in other cases, and which shews that he partakes much of the nature of that month of the year which wears so warlike a name; but which is, nevertheless, proverbially said, to "come in like a Lion, and go out like a Lamb!"

At all events we think that the public, until this affair shall be in one way or other cleared up, will be inclined to judge of Mr. Bennett, as Doctor Johnson did of an impertinent and blustering coxcomb of his day, that it s safer " to believe what he shall prove, rather than what he may assert."

Long before Mr. Bennett shall have digested this, we shall furnish him with another meal, which probably, he may find not quite so sweet as his Shrewsbury cakes.

By the way, it is probably the character of Mr. Bennett's productions that has recommended him to the judicious makers of the aforesaid cakes; for like them, his pamphlets and his speeches are light, thin and brittle. occupying a large space, but containing neither substance nor nourishment, gratifying for a moment to a vitiated taste, but cloying, vapid and unwholesome.

THE QUEEN'S SUBSCRIPTION.

We have the satisfaction to inform our readers, that the Committee at Brookes's have made their first report on this important subject. ### JOHN BULL TO THE QUEEN .- (No. II.)

MADAM,—You are now, I should suppose, somewhat more enlightened on the subject of public opinion than you were when I last addressed you. The majorities in Parliament must have opened your eyes, and you now cannot fail to see what would have been the fate of the Bill of Pains and Penalties, had not a leniency (in my opinion ill-judged) staid its passage from the House of

Day after day, your claims have been under consideration day after day your merits have been discussed; and day after day your partizans have decreased; till, on Thursday night, out of six hundred and fitty-eight Representatives of the people of England, there were but thirty-seven—(count them over Madam)—thirty-seven individuals to be found to uphold you in the last effort of the brother of your solitary and salaried female companion.

This is sad work for your vanity—a grievous exposure of the real state of the case; deplorable, indeed, is your position, when, after the agitation of the question, you have nothing to oppose to the opinion of the nation at large, delivered by its lawful Representatives, but the countenance of Alderman Wood, and the tributary shouts of your Monday mobs.

It must be allowed, that the processions to Brandenburgh are amusing enough, and the pageants of the glass-blowers and tinkers highly interesting to the curious in tumblers and frying-pans; but to you, who know why you are favoured by their visitations, the joke must now be somewhat stale. The satisfaction your Majesty derives from seeing all their mummeries and Tomfooleries must be of much the same nature as that which Dr. Eady, of Dean street, Soho, enjoys in reading his own name upon every dead wall in the bills of mortality. Indeed, your case and the Doctor's are parallel—you both hire your partizans, you both buy your celebrity, and find your own chalk; and the only real gratification either of you can have in looking at the support which you appear to receive, must arise from laughing at the stupidity of the credulous blockheads who are weak enough to believe in the genuineness of your popularity.

Flagrant, however, and evident as the falsehood and hollowness of this popularity is, to persons who judge for themselves, it appears to me most miraculous, that at fifty-seven years of age, you should not have conquered your inclinations and propensities so far as to be able to prevent their overturning the system of deception, which has been now carried on for some time; and exposing, even to the least gifted of your besotted followers, your pertinacious adherence to the faults and follies, which it has been your object, and that of your adherents for you, hitherto loudly to disclaim.

Pray, Madam, to which of your virtues and feelings are we to attribute those attentions, which you have so recently bestowed upon His Excellency Baron Bartolomeo Bergami, Grand Master of the Illustrione Order of Saint

Caroline?—At a moment when the merits of your case were before the country—at a moment when your modesty, purity, prudence and virtue were to be blazoned in their brightest colours, what induced you to load your Grand Master with presents and money? What could lead you to forward those favours by a courier in the livery of your Royal Husband?

That you should continue to bestow your favours on the servant you had chosen to elevate, is to me by no means wonderful; and if you consider (as doubtless being a foreigner, and full of foreign prejudices, you do)

2 pair of diamond ear-rings, a gentlemanly appendage to your Baron's ears, and happening to have a pair to give away, it seems to me most natural that you should bestow these marks of your favour upon him: and if you thought a new English travelling carriage, built by Stodart, more convenient to his Excellency than a foreign vehicle, it appears but kind to have sent him one; but I confess it seems an injudiciously chosen time for making pecuniary gifts—to enquire where the money came from which was transferred from your Majesty's bankers in London, to the house of Lafitte and Co. at Paris, is not, at this moment, my object. I reserve that for another day, and only now remark what Brougham has remarked before [and for the consequences of which he trembled, when he sent James to you] the mischief arising to yourself from the uncontrolable violence of your passions.

This want of caution, when impelled by strong feeling, accounts for the otherwise unaccountable scenes in which you have been engaged, and the awkward situa-tions in which you have been discovered on the continent: indeed, your conduct in your youth evinced the warmth of your character, else how could one reconcile to one's mind, the fact of your behaviour to General Windsor, at your father's court, which I have before alluded to, and when Lord Holland was present. What but rashness could have induced your two nocturnal rambles about Lord Sheffield's house in search of a room which you first failed in finding, and which, when you had found it, proved only the scene of your disappointment? What but blindness could have led you into a servant's room instead of your own, in returning from this exploration; or, what but inconsiderateness could have induced you to leave a ring behind you, the word on which (though disguised in Greek characters) identified, not accidentally, its owner?

This rushness besides, has a double operation, for it leads your Majesty not only into violent expressions of attachment to particular persons, but into the abandonment of others who have as strong claims on your favour. If Bergami's pretensions are founded on his good conduct as a domestic, what has Mr. Roberts (once Page to your Majesty) done, that he should not be rewarded? It is impossible for me to know by what standard your Majesty measures the merits of your servants; but it appears to me, from all I can collect, that your neglect of your Majesty's second coachman, who accompanied you to the continent, is equally inconsiderate with your forgetfulness of the page I have just mentioned, for, by general roport, he appears to have been equally active and faithful, and to have a title to your favourable pro-tection, not in the least inferior to that of His Excellency your Courier and GRAND MASTER himself.

I must repeat, however, that the greatest proof of your rashness, which I myself have witnessed, is the having chosen this particular moment to evince your continued esteem for Bergami: we shall of course know how the enormous sums drawn by your Majesty for law ex-pences have been expended; which will refute the many shameful insinuations that people who pretend to know you well, are free to throw out—gifts of money from ladies to men, and those men their inferiors, are always suspicious. Your conduct three or four years since in that way, where Bergami was not concerned, but Brougham was, was very imprudent; but this affair proves how true the report is, that you reject the advice of all those, who, by their habits and talents, are enabled to give you counsel, and how painful that restraint has been which has compelled you, till this fatal eruption of your passions, to feigh the distressed mother, the afflicted wife, and the injured Queen.

I remain, your fellow subject,
JOHN BULL.

TO JOHN BULL.

SIR,-There is no man who will be found to deny that the late Mr. Fox had talents of a superior order; and there is no man who can deny that the professed object of his life was the support and vindication of our free-

It may not be unamusing nor uninstructive to your readers, to run their eyes over the following extract of a speech made by that great WHIG Leader in the year 1771, wherein sentiments are expressed and arguments are adduced, by which gentlemen of that misguided persuasion might in these days be answered to their heart's content: I, however, for candour's sake, should mention that the Whigs [poor creatures!] were at that period in place.

Your's, RETROSPECT. "No doctrine was ever yet broached in this kingdom, either so dangerous, or so ridiculous, as that which seriously insists that the House of Commons, because elected, is without jurisdiction, and that the people, because the origin of all power, must therefore be exempt from all obedience. The people make the laws, as well as the legislators; but will any advocate of licentiousness presume to say, because they are the fountain of authority, that they are of consequence discharged from a submission to legal institutions?—The law, Sir, is as much the creature of their formation as this house; yet surely it will not be said, that they are to tread it under foot, or to

Whether the PROPLE AT LARGE, OR THIS HOUSE, ARE THE BEST APOGES OF THE PUBLIC WELFARE? FOR MY OWN PART, SIR, I SHALL NOT HESITATE TO PRO-NOUNCE POSITIVELY IN FAVOUR OF THE HOUSE. What acquaintance have the people at large with the arcana of political rectitude, with the connections of kingdoms, the resources of national strength, the abilities of ministers, or even with their own dispositions? If we are to believe the very petitions which they have lately presented to the throne, they are unequal to those powers which the constitution has trusted to their hands. They have the power of electing their representatives; yet you see they constantly abuse this power, and appoint those the guardians of their dearest rights, whom they accuse of conspiring against the interests of their country. For these reasons I pay no regard whatever to the voice of the people: it is our duty to do what is proper, without considering what may be agreeable: their business is to chuse us; it is our business to act constitutionally, and to maintain the independency of parliament; whether it is attacked by the people or by the crown, is a matter of little consequence: it is the attack, not the quarter it proceeds from, which we are to punish; and if we are to be controlled in our necessary jurisdiction, can it signify much, whether faction intimidates us with a rabble; or the king surrounds us with his guards? If we are driven from the direct line of justice, by the threats of a mob, our existence is useless in the community. The minority within doors, need only assault us by their myrmidons without, to gain their ends upon every occasion. Blows will then carry what their arguments cannot effect, and the people will be their own agents, though they elect us to represent them in parliament—What must the consequence be? Universal anarchy. I stand up for the constitution, not for the people; if the people attempt to invade the constitution, they are enemies to the nation. Being therefore convinced that we are to do justice, whether it is agreeable or disagreeable, I am for maintaining the independency of parliament, and will not be a rebel to my king, to my country, or my own heart, for the loudest huzza of an inconsiderate multitude."

TO THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD MAYOB.

My Lord,-There is something so irresistibly comical in the greatness of persons in your Lordship's situation, (formed as the Corporation of London is at present) that one cannot find in one's heart to be angry with any thing they say or do; and so long as they confine themselves to the duties of giving dinners and balls, and going swan-hopping, your Lord Mayors are rather pleasant creatures than otherwise.

You are aware, I am sure, that in all Tom-fooleries, the greater the gravity with which they are conducted, the more decided their success; and so far I grant you that your processions, and men in armour, and gingerbresd barges, and smoke-dried banners, and all the rest of it, are (as accessory to the fun) admirable in their way: but there are bounds to the importance of all men, and when a Lord Mayor begins to fancy himself really a great personage, he ceases to be ridiculous -becomes contemptible.

Your Lordship is pleased to be a politician; and, as far as I can collect from the trash which is attributed to you in the way of speeches, you are almost as great a patriot, and quite as great a booby, as Wood.

But unwilling as I am to be serious with a thing which is addressable only for twelve months of its existence, I cannot but recal to your Lordship's memory (which, by the converse of a general rule, touching wits ought to be a particularly good one,) some events of your early life. It will do you no disservice, for it will prove that, which is not very apparent to casual auditors that you have been at school; it is to the period at which you flourished at Merchant-Tadors, that I wish to call the attention, not only of your Lordship, but of all JOHN BULL's numerous readers.

I think it was in the year 1795-6, that the fourth form of Merchant-tailors was infected with the mad and sanguinary principles of the French revolution. About that period, your Lordship, and the check-taker at Thelwall's Lectures in Beaufort-buildings, with Masters Grose and Wadd, Lave laws on political matters, and retailed Thelwall's doctrines to your school-fellows.

On the morning of the late Queen's birth-day, in that year, one of the fourth-form boys, whose name your Lordship must perfectly well remember, (but which I choose purposely to forget,) taking advantage of the residence of a relation in the Tower, displayed a tri-coloured flag on the round tower of that fortress. This flag had been bought by subscription; and the boy who hoisted it had been made the dupe of his seniors; for example-sake, however, two only of the ring-leaders, were expelled, Thelwall's check-taker, and the foolish fellow who hoisted the traitorous symbol of anarchy and revolution.

Your Lordship, by dint of dullness and consequent long memory, may remember that your respected head master in a few days subsequent to this event stated to the boys, that he had received an application from three gentlemen, to request that the two boys might be allowed to resume their studies. The head boy of the school desired the three gentlemen might be introduced, and advised the head master not to accompany them, which advice he followed. The boys, as your Lordship may recollect, then formed their pocket-handkerchiefs into what are called hard Westminster knots, and waited the arrival of the ambassadors; when Messrs. John Horne Tooke, Orator Thelwall, and Counsellor Kidd, made their appearance, and solicited the re-admission of the expelled youngsters.

Your Lordship can tell who proposed their re-admission amongst the boys, and how decidedly the proposition was negatived, and your Lordship may remember that the they fled through the Cloisters, up Suffolk-lane, Bushlane, Cannon-street, Queen-street, and so into Cheapside.

Having seen the castigation bestowed upon these three worthies, it is a matter of surprise to some, that having grown older, you should not have grown wiser than to persist in principles which, if you were of any sort of impostance, would entail upon you the contempt of all loyal and thinking men.

Receive Her Majesty on the 1st of March, if she persists in obtruding herself upon civic notice; and while you are dancing attendance upon that pure and illustrious personage, never forget that the address of the married ludies of England-(mark that, my temporary Lord)-was read to that Queen by the wife of that Orator Thelwall, whom you have seen hooted, pelted, and thumped with every indignity, for attempting to support only a school-boy; and consider what a state of degradation a Princes of high blood must have fallen into, who received as a complimentary vindication of her character, an address from such a person—sele ted as the best amongst a multitude to deliver it!—I am, Sir, yours,

PUBLIUS.

THE QUEEN'S GENEROSITY TO A POOR TRADESMAN.

TO JOHN BULL.

Mr. EDITOR,-If you think that the following statement is likely to prove of service, and at the same time be beneficial to an old man upwards of 81 years of age, by inserting it in your valuable columns, you will oblige a constant reader.

I state the facts as I heard them from the man's own mouth, whose name is Potter, and who resides at a baker's, in John Street West, Edgeware Road: he is, by trade, a carpenter, but has employed his va-cant hours in making snuff boxes, small cabinets, tea-chests, &c. of exquisite workmanship, inlaid with every description of English and foreign woods. A teachest of this description, which occupied him up-wards of a year and a half in finishing, and which is allowed by people who have seen it, to be a perfect specimen of the art, he has been offered thirty, forty, and sixty guineas for it; finding, however, it was the cause of attracting several visitors to his house, he declined parting with it; but, having suffered a severe illness, he was reduced to the greatest misery, and obliged to sell nearly all the little furniture he possessed.

The tea chest in question was in pawn, among other things; but a person who interested himself much about him advanced him sufficient money to redeem it, and advised him strenuously to offer it for sale at Branden-burgh House: as the deluded old creature was a great admirer of her Majesty, placing great faith in her bounty, he was induced to do so, saying, at the same time, he would leave it entirely to her generosity, to give him whatever she thought fit.

Not receiving an immediate answer, he was obliged to leave Brandenburgh House, after having excited the compassion of a domestic, who gave him half-a-crown to take him back to London: he afterwards received a note from Lady Anne Hamilton stating that her Majesty was exceedingly pleased with the chest, and was graciously pleased to accept it!

Potter was induced to call on Alderman Wood on the subject, who gave him two one pound notes, and begged that he might hear nothing further on the subject: however, some friends who took some trouble respecting him, have forwarded from Brandenburgh House, since that time, ten pounds, a sum ridiculously inadequate to the value of the box.

Now, what the poor man wishes, is either to procure a further sum from the Queen, or else get the box returned to him, by refunding the twelve pounds, as he has been offered fifty and sixty pounds for it by private individuals.

So much trouble has been taken for the poor man, and with so little effect, that I am afraid any direct application again to Brandenburgh House will not succeed; and therefore I sincerely hope you will take some notice of this in your future communications respecting her Majesty, and remain,

Mr. Editor, your obedient servant,
A FRIEND TO THE OLD MAN.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

PARIS, Feb. 7 .- Tri-coloured Cockade .- One Sieur Cretien, retired Lieuwnant, had presented a Petition on behalf of him self and other Officers who had served in the Royal Guard of Joseph Buonaparte, during his usurpation of the Spanish Throne, complaining that the Minister of War had refused to allow them some arrears of pay due to them on account of that

The Reporter from the Committee of Petitions stated, that these arrears had never been considered as a charge on the French Government, and therefore recommended that the Chamber should get rid of the Petition by the order of the

In the course of the discussion which ensued, General Foy, in speaking in explanation, alluded to the laurels which the Petitioner and his comrades had gained under "the glorious tri-colour cockade." The expression produced an instant burst of horror from the right side of the Chamber. The General emphatically repeated, "Yes, the glorious tri-colour!" Cries of "Order, order," resounded through the Hall.

M. Dudon rose to shew how he thought the General had transgressed; he had characterised, he said, as glorious, a sign which the law had formally prohibited from being hoisted, under pain of being considered as "a provocation to insurrec-tion."—"We know nothing," added M. Marcellus, "but the ushite flag!—Long live the white flag!"—In this exclamation he was joined by the great body of the Chamber.

General Tarayre on this rushed to the Tribune, and made an animated extemporary harangue, in vindication of the favourite revolutionary emblem. It was a monument, he said, launch out into the barbarisms of their natural state, after solemnly forming a compact of civil society.

"The only point therefore remaining to be discussed is, from the knotted handkerchiefs of the scholars, and how it had, indeed, been changed for another emblem, but it was inseparably, connected with what could never be changed—the remembrance of the glory which France had enjoyed for more than a quarter of a century. The altercation was prolonged by various speakers, with a degree of violence which the President found it difficult to controll, till it at last subsided into a vote on the Petition, when the Chamber passed to the Order of the Day, by a large majority.

VIENNA, Jan. 30.—The basis upon which all the negociations at Laybach will be founded, it is believed, will be—First, The entire dominion of all the States of Italy, in confirmation of the state quo stipulated by the Treaties of 1815; and secondly, The admissibility of Representative Constitutions for each of the Italian States. It is, therefore, only necessary to abolish the existing Constitutional Government, which has been obtained by a revolution, and to substitute for it a legal Constitutional Government. To accomplish this end, propositions are said to have been made by the Court of Vienna, to which Russia has acceded, and the Duke de Gallo is to be dispatched to Naples for the purpose of communicating them to the Goto Naples for the purpose of communicating them to the Government and the National Parliament. The answer cannot arrive before the middle of February, and hostilities will not be commenced until that period. The Marquis de Ruffo will supcommenced until that period. The marquis de runo will supply the place of the Duke de Gallo at the conferences, during the absence of the latter.

It is reported, that in case of a rupture the King of Naples will be invited to take up his abode at Vienna.

COURT OF CHANCERY, MONDAY, FEB. 12.

Hall. v. Towls, and Others.

Mr. Hart moved for an Injunction to restrain the defendants from pirating the plaintiff's Invention for improving thread or yarn. The Letters Patent were obtained in Nov. 1817. In consequence of the celebrity of Urling's patent lace, the defendants were induced to infringe upon the plaintiffs patent, and to manufacture similar lace, to the great detriment of the plaintiff and his partners. After hearing the arguments, and examining the lace, the Lo,d Chancellor granted the Injunction.

ASTRONOMY.—Baron Lindeneau has recently published some observations respecting the diminution of the solar mass. He supposes the sun's diameter to be 800.000 miles—4,204,000,000 feet, or nearly 2,000 seconds, We have not, he observes, hitherto possessed any instrument for measuring the diameter of heavenly bodies to a second. The sun may therefore diminish 12,000 of its diameter, or 2,102,000 feet, without the possibility of being perceived. Supposing the sun to diminish daily two feet, it would require three thousand years to render the diminution of a second of its diameter visible.

NEW COMET.-Signor Pons, Astronomer of the Duchy of Lucca, discovered on the 21st of last month, between six and seven o'clock at night, in the constellation It appears like a white spot, not thick nor of a kernel form, and with a very small tail. On the 22d, Signor Pons continued his observations, and perceived that the Comet had not changed its position, but that its tail was becoming more visible, and its light had acquired greater intensity. He thence concluded that this Comet will become rapidly more luminous, and to such a degree as to be visible by the naked eye. Astronomers have fixed its right ascension at 0 deg. 30 min, and its northern declination at 18 deg. between the stars of the sixth magnitude x and u of Pegasus.

GENEROUS DISINTERESTEDNESS .- An order for some statues having been sent to the celebrated Danish sculptor Thorvaldson, when at Rome, by the King of Prussia, the sculpter, in return, begged to inform his Majesty, that one of his own subjects, a sculptor, resident like himself at Rome, was as well, if not better, qualified to execute the work. In consequence of his letter, Rudolf Schadow, the Prussian, received the order.

On Mouday evening, the 12th inst. about seven o'clock, the celestial bemisphere presented a novel and interesting appearance. The new moon appeared in the south-western part of the heavens shewing a hrilliant crescent on its upper limb, the entire circumference of its opake body being at the same time perceptible to the eye. Immediately below the moon the beautiful planet Jupiter was very easily distinguishable; and about 10 degrees to the south-east of the moon, the planet Saturn appeared with an unusual degree of splendour. Thus three of the most magnificent objects which the celestial canopy presents to the human eye were observable at a glance.

Almost the whole city was inundated, and in many of the streets the inhabitants could only leave their houses in boats. All the ships which were in the port suffered great damage.

BUONAPARTE.—A letter from St. Helena, dated the 17th December, states, that Bonaparte's house is finished, but not furnished. He rode out a few days before the letter was written to Sandy Bay, to breakfast, his provision having been carried on a mulc, and ate his meal on the This was the first time he was on horseback for nearly four years, and from his inactive life and corpulency, he was so much fatigued, that he was obliged to have a carriage to convey him back to Longwood. ### POLICE.

BOW-STREET.—Tuesday a private examination took place at this office before Sir Robert Baker, and Mr. Minshill, of an extraordinary affair.
Sir James Crawford, Bart. who has lately so often figured in the Courts of law at Paris, was charged with creating a riot at the residence of the French Ambassador, and with presenting a pistol and threatening to shoot some of his domestics.

Sir James, it appeared, went on Tuesday morning to the Duke de Caze's house, in Portland-place, about the time that his Excellency and family returned from chapel, and having gained defiency and family returned from chapel, and having gained admission to the hall, demanded, in rather a peremptory manner to see the Duke.—He was, however, informed by the porter, that it being post day, the Duke was engaged in important matters, and could not be seen. Sir James, however, said he had business of the greatest consequence with the Duke, and must see him; and the porter then requested his card, and shewed him into a small room where some of the Duke's with the porter than requested his card, and shewed him into a small room where some of the Duke's suite were, and where Sir James repeated his demand to be admitted to the presence of his Excellency. Upon a refusal he became very warm, and declared he would see the Ambassador before he quitted the house. A young gentleman, a relation of the Duke, remonstrated with the Baronet, requesting him with meah collinear to leave the house the state of the second ing him, with much politeness, to leave the house; but with-out effect. He walked about the room in great agitation, indulging himself in much invective against his Excellency, and stating that the object of his visit was to procure the restitution of two trunks containing valuable papers which the Duke had caused to be taken from his hotel. The young Gentleman before-mentioned continued to remonstrate, and with some degree of warmth insisted on his retiring from the house but Sir James still refused, and at length produced a pistol which he levelled at those opposed to him, and declared he would shoot them if they attempted to lay a hand upon him. One of the Duke's suite hereupon drew his sword, and Sir James was finally compelled to leave the house.

Sir James, in his defence, alledged, that two trunks belonging to him, containing papers of great importance, had been taken from Greillon's Hotel to the house of the Duke Decazes, but this was contradicted by M. and Madame Greillon, who stated that the trunks were at the Hotel, and were decisined these without which were the property below into the state. tained there with other property belonging to Sir James, because he refused to pay his bill. They also charged Sir James with violent conduct at their Hotel, and shaking his fist in Madame Greillon's face.

Sir R. Baker having consulted with his Brother Magistrate, Sir R. Baker naving consumed with his probabilistic and the field of the duty to call upon him to give security, himself in 2,0001, and two sureties in 1,0001, each, that he would keep the peace towards the Duke Decases and his family. With respect to Mons. and Mad. Greillon, he must also give bail, himself in 500l. and two sureties in 250l. each.

Sir Robert Baker told Sir James that his conduct was exceedingly improper, and he must give 24 hours' notice of bail to the complaining parties.

Sir James, however, persisted in his resolution not to give bail. He was committed to the House of Correction.

OLD BAILEY.

WEDLERDAY. The Sessions this marning commenced before Mr. Baron Graham, Mr. Justice Best and Mr. Justice Richardson. The calender does not contain a great number of prisoners, nor are the offences for which they are indicted of any great enormity. The total number is 183, and 18 of them are for uttering forged Bank-notes. There are only three for housebreaking, nine for burglary, and four for highway robbery; there are also 15 for stealing from the person, and 103 for various offences.

John Collins was capitally indicted for stealing, in the dwellinghouse of Richard Adams, silver spoons and other articles of plate, of considerable value.

It was proved that the prisoner, a lad of about the age of 17, stole the plate out of the kitchen of Mr. Adams's house, on the 24th of January. He was pursued by a soldier who was on the spot, and he dropped the plate: he was overtaken and brought back to the house, and he begged to be let off, and promised never to do so again.

The prisoner made no defence which was satisfactory to the Court, and no dict-Guilty, ed no witnesses were called. The Jury found a ver-

He was recommended to mercy on the ground of his youth. The learned Judge said that the recommendation should be attended to.

Charles Wilkinson was indicted for cutting a portmanteau from behind the carriage of Mr. Wilberforce, M. P. on its way to Gore-street. The fact was distinctly proved by one of the servants of Mr. Wilberforce, and the prisoner was apprehended with the trunk upon him—Guilty.

Taunan vy.—Samuel Young was indicted for stealing two turkey's and other poultry, the property of Ann Wicks. George Taylor, a constable, deposed, that he went to the lodgings of the prisoner, and in the coal-hole discovered a hamper, in which were two turkles picked, and other poultry, which he said were sent from his mother in Suffolk; he took the prisoner to the watch-house. The head and legs of a game cock were produced, which were sworn to by the servant.—The Jury found the prisoner Guitty, but recommended him to mercy.

Thomas Boling and John Billing were indicated for stealing agreat coat, value 31, the property of Catherine Kent.—Doling, Builty - Billing, Not Guilty.

Mortimer Jones, alias Edward Mortimer Jones, was put to the bar, to plend to an indictment charging him with making a false affidavit before the Surrogate of Sir William Scott, for the purpose of obtaining a licence to solemnize a marriage with Miss C. Lovell, a young lady of considerable fortune, congrary to the wish and without the knowledge or consent of her father and guardian, Wm. Harvey Lovell, Fsq. The prisoner plended "Not Gullry," and the trial was postponed by con-sent until next Sessions. He is a young min of very gentlemnolike appearance.

RIGHT OF ADMISSION TO COURT.—Mr. Duncan Campbell the Gentleman that has so frequently appeared in the Courts of Law, made a complaint againt the door-keeper for refusing him admittance; which Mr. Campbell said be claimed as the right of a British sabject. It appeared that Mr. Campbell was in attendance to give evidence before the Grand Jury in supporting a bill that had been preferred against a thief for robbing him of his watch.

The Court told Mr. Campbell that had be explained to the door-keeper that he had business, admission would at all times be given to hire, or any one else; but the Court was not large enough to admit every "British subject."

BIRMINGHAM.-Last week, three men stopped a licensed hawker, named Whitfield, at the bottom of Gravelly Hill, near Litchfield, knocked him down, and took from his person, two 51. Bank of England notes, one numbered 525, and fifteen 11. notes of the said Bank. The villains then threw the poor man into the Canal, near the draw-bridge, and ran off. With some difficulty he crawled out, and ran to Mr. Chapman's house. A pursuit took place by the Police, but without effect.

CARLISLE.—A lamentable accident occurred on Thursday se'might, to Mr. Thompson, surgeon. He had been spending the evening at Stanwix, and parted with a friend at Eden-terrace. His body was found a few days after in the river about tiree miles below the bridge, there were no marks of violence on his person.

Durham.—A respectable inhabitant of Corbridge, lost his life during the inclemency of the weather under the following circumstances. He had taken copiously of whiskey at a low house by the road side, between Satley and Wolsingham, and on reaching the road he lost the use of his limbs and his reason. and laid himself down among some rushes where he was found the next morning a lifeless corpse. The poisonous stuff which the unfortunate man had taken is manufactured in the plantations of John George Lambton, Esq. in that neighbourhood, from stuff composed of aquafortis or vitriol and spirits of wine. Within the last eight weeks three persons have died from drinking it to excess, and another man has been driven blind and mad. The agents of Mr. Lambton should enquire into this.

Nonwich.—Sunday evening last, as Richard Murray (serwant to Mr. Hudson, St. George's Bridge-street) was returning from Stratton, in a gig, with his wife and child, the horse took fright near the Hospital, and running violently dawn St. Stephon's-street made for a narrow passage to a yard (near Mr. Walker's, gunsmith) where he had fermerly been kept. The gig was overtuned, and dashed to pieces; the man, whose need was fractured, was conveyed by Mr. Walker's assistance to the Hospital in a state of insensibility, and has since undergone the operation of trepanning; the woman was also much bruised, and was taken home in a backney-coach; the child providentially escaped unburt.

FALKIER.—The body of a young woman named Walkin-shaw, was found a few days since in the count just below Bainsford bridge. About six weeks ago she left her father's house in Falkirk, for Laureston, accompanied by her brother, with the intention of inviting some of her friends, who reside at the obove village, to her marriage, which it was intended should have taken place the following Friday. She parted with her brother near Calendar-house, and then it seems, accompanied amain who lodged at her father's to a public house in Bening of the course they also a her had been as a seem of the same was not bearing. ford, where they slept, and the young woman was not beend of after untill for MAIDSTONE. Our theatre, which has almost nightly been made a place for the display of political feeling, on Thursday vening exhibited quite a new feature; for most of the felks in the gallery have hitherto been lavish in their applause for the Queen, but on the above night, when an overflowing audience honoured the theatre, a cry was made by some one in the gal-lery, for three cheers for the Queen; but instead of this having the desired effect, it was received with hisses, and was immediately followed up by three groams for her Majesty; and the performances concluded with "God save the King," performed by the excellent band of the West Kent Militia, without the MANCH BOTER. Seven rufflans, in the night of Tuesday e'snight, broke into the house of the Rev. E. Booth, of Chow bent, and robbed it of 1001. in cash. a valuable gold watch, and other property. They returned shortly after they had quitted the premises, and offered, as the watch might be a favourite, to return it for 21. The offer was accepted) and a pooket-book containing 41. was produced, in order to pay the ruffians, but they took that also, and decamped with the whole. They had tied the maid down to the bed.

MANSPIRLD .- The fox cover of the Duke of Portland, situated about a mile from here, and in the occupation of Mr. Neale, was discovered to be in flumes, a few days since, and the whole, with the fences and hedges on the north and oust sides, were literally burnt to embers. It was an ornament to PLYMOUTH.—A poor seaman of colour, whose limbs were frost-bitten in a vessel in the Channel, had both his legs amputated at our hospital on Thursday—the feet had previously dropped from the ancles.

BFFIELD.—A striking instance of the uncommon mildness of the season, at this period of the year, may be witnessed in the garden of Mr. Woollen, at Gatesfield, near this town, where an apricot-tree is at present in full bloom. A sprig from a oherry-tree, in the grounds of Mr. Mitchell, of Broad-lane, was shown in this town, covered with buds and blossoms.

WORCESTER.—Our City was thrown into the greatest alarm on Friday se'nnight, in consequence of a fire breaking out in the National School-Room, which is adjoining to a building in which were deposited 20 barrels of gunpowder, 40 hogsheads of oil, and a large quantity of turpentine: the school-girls rushed to the window, and were caught either in the arms of the inhubitants, or in blankets, and escaped with little injury—the gun-powder, &c. were fortunately removed in time, or nearly the whole city must have been destroyed. The School-Room and premises under were completely destroyed.

ACCIDENTS. OFFENCES, &c.

AWFUL INSTANCE OF SUDDEN DEATH .- Wednesday the Protestant Dissenting Ministers of the three denominations, assembled at Dr. Williams's library, in Red Cross-street, with a view of considering the projected Bill of Mr. Brougham, on the subject of Education. Several Ministers and expressed their syntiments, and among the rest Dr. Lindsey. A friendly conversation having been finished, the Secretary, the Rev. Dr. Morgan, was proceeding to read to the Meeting a Series of Resolutions, when the attention of the company was arrested by an appearance of severe indisposition in Dr. Lindsey; be fell insensible into the arms of those around him. Medicul aid was instantly called in, but it was too late, the spirit had fled to God who gave it. The whole company was too much affected by this awful stroke to proceed with business. The Rev. Dr. Waugh, uttended by a large company of Ministers, offered an appropriate prayer.

Remarkable Prevention to Peaching—A gentleman of Hampshire, who was in the labit of being robbed almost every night by poachers, &c. adopted a novel and effectual mode of putting an end to this depredation. He went to Loudon, purchased a man's leg at an hospital, and on his return had it hung up near the next place of public meeting, with a label attached to it, stating it had been caught on his grounds, and requesting the right owner would send for it. This had such an effect, that he has not since been robbed.

Hydrophobia.—A lamentable instance of the effect of this dreadful malady occurred last week at Epping. A shoemaker, who had been bit in the wrist last Christmas by a dog with which he had been playing, complained on Monday se'nnight of a choking in the throat; on the following day he was af-of a choking in the throat; on the following day he was afflicted with fits, which continued until Thursday, when he expired in great agony. He was perfectly sensible during the intervals of pain, and prayed fervently with a clergyman.

CORONER'S INQUEST.—An inquisition was taken Thursday afternoon, before T. Shelton, Esq. Coroner, in the Vestry Room of St. John's Church, Southwark, on view of the body of Thomas House and 60 who puts a period to his evictory of Thomas Haws, aged 60, who put a period to his existence in the privy of the King of Prusia public-house, Horselydown, by cutting his throat, almost from ear to ear, with a large clasp knife. The Jury having no doubt of the deceased's insanity, from all the circumstances connected with his ceath, had no hesitation in returning a ventice to that effect.

The following malefactors were executed Tuesday morn ing, in front of Newgate, pursuant to their sentences at the Old Bailey, viz.—Thomas Elliot, Joseph Wooten, and Wm. Bullock, for street robberies, attended with circumstances of peculiar atrocity; and Abraham Hemmingway, concerned with Thomas Webb, who was executed Dec. 5, 1820, for robbing Enfield Church. On the preceding evening a respite during pleusure, was received for Michael Hartley, convicted of a high-way robbery.

LUNDON MARKETS.

COBN EXCHANGE, FRIDAY, Ran. 16.
There was some quantily of Wheat remaining over from Monday's market, which, with what came to hand this moning, met a heavy sale on lower terms. Fine Barley sells quite as well, but the ordinary qualities are cheaper.—We have had a good supply of Onts this week, but five fresh core is taken off freely on much the same terms, but inferior is lower.—In Beans and Pease we have no alteration to notice.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY. Earl Grey rose to move for all communications between this Government and that of Naples, with regard to the late occurrences in that kingdom. The Noble Earl noticed the part taken by the Allied Sovereigns in respect to the establishment of a free constitution in Naples. The British Government had disclaimed all interference in the transactions of the Allied Sovereigns, and had laid on the table a letter in confirmation of their neutrality; but he was sorry to say, that letter did not furnish a satisfactory proof of our non-interference. If changes in governments took place, no matter how unanimous were the people, no matter how useful to the community which accomplished them, no matter how inoffensive to other Powers, the Holy Alliauce had, it seemed, an ex gratia kind of authority to resist changes of any kind; to them devolved the right of sitting in judgment on every State, even of calling to their tribunal a brother monarch who had assented to the desired change, to enforce retraction, or to coerce all resistance by arms. The Noble Earl asserted, that when the ance by arms. The Noble Earl asserted, that when the conduct of the Allies was known, Ministers allied themselves closer with the conclave, but suspended all amicable intercourse with Naples. An Austrian army was stationed on the frontier, while a British squadron was cruizing their seas; and one of our vessels had been employed in executing the scandulous summons of the Allies, by which the King of Naples was obliged to repair to Laybach. With respect to the circular, it amounted simply to a declaration, that it would be in direct repugnance to the fundamental principles of this country to co-operate in the project of the Allies; and it professed not to prejudge the question, or to interfere with the course which other States might adopt (and he begged their Lordships to observe this)-" that they were ready to give every reasonable assurance that their views were not directed to purposes of aggrandisement subversive of the territorial system of Europe, as established by the late treaties."—Now, in his view of the subject, the whole conduct of his Majesty's Government had been most reprehensible; they passed an implied consure on the Allied Courts, while they refused to remain in intercourse with Naples. The Noble Earl asked, did not the assembling of an army on the Italian frontier, the summoning of the king to Laybach, the suspension of the British Minister at Naples, coupled with the declaration contained in the paper on the table, amount to this :- that although we asserted the right of an independent nation to regulate its own government, we admitted that Naples must be an excepted case?

The Earl of Liverpool contended, that the paper on the table furnished the best proof that his Majesty's Government was acting, in respect of Naples, on a principle of perfect neutrality. This country was no narry to any transactions of the Halv trality. This country was no party to any transactions of the Holv Alliance, nor had any engagement, but what was in the face of the papers laid before Parliament. But the principal objection that the Noble Lord had raised to the conduct of his Majesty's Government with respect to Naples was, that in professing a determination to act upon a system of neutrality, they yet accompanied that declaration with a disapproval of the mode and circumstances under which that revolution was accomplished. Now he had no difficulty in saying, that with that sentiment he concurred; and though he saw no reason for interference, yet he still condemned the means by which that revolution had been accomplished. It had been accomplished by a military mutiny; and the Spanish Constitution, under all its cincumstances; had been adopted. Now though that revolution was effected by a military mutiny, though they adopted the Spanish Constitution, still he was of opinion, that these two circumstances constituted no ground whatever for the interference of other States. ference of other States. Government, he contended, were justified in expressing their opinion, and condemning a revolution founded by such means; nay, the Sicilians had refused to adopt the constitution which Naples had endeavoured to force upon them. The Noble Earl condemned the conduct of the Carbonari, a sect whose principles were not confined to Naples alone, but extended to other countries, and therefore became the more dangerous. He denied that any interruption had arisen to the diplomatic relations between the two countries; arisen to the diplomatic relations between the two countries; for Sir W. A'Court was our Minister at Naples, and Count Ludolf is Neapolitan Minister in this country.

Lerd Holland contended, that the papers on the table were incomplete in respect to proving that Ministers had acted in the business with strict neutrality. He confessed that, considering those papers, listening to all that fell from the Noble Earl, and the whole of the proceedings at large, he had suspicions that connexion really existed between our Ministers and the Allied Powers in their lossifier to Naples. And powers are their lossifier to Naples. and the Allied Powers in their hostility to Naples. and the Allied Powers in their hostility to Naples. And now, looking to all the circumstances of the case, although his suggestion was not adopted, he was satisfied they took their dialogue from some similar work. He recollected that Sir Christopher Hatton in the Critic thus addresses the gallent

Tell me, thou champion of thy country's fame-For there's a question which I still must ask, A question which I never asked before— What mean these mighty armaments,

This general muster and this throng of chiefs?"

The stander-by immediately asks, "How came Sir Christopher Hatton never to ask that question before?" and the author immediately replies, "What, before the play began? how the plague could he?" Sir Walter then goes on to inform Sir Christopher Hatton of many things with which he is very well accounted when the stander-by again interferes and asks the acquainted, when the stander-by again interferes, and asks the author, "Why as Sir Christopher Hatton knew all that, did Sir Walter Raleigh go on telling it him?" To whom the author replies rather indignantly, "He knows it well enough, it is that he had a made and the standard of the s it is true, but the audience are not supposed to know any thing of the matter—are they?" Now the Ministers of England, Austria, and Naples, were just situated like the characters in this drama. England, who knew what was in agitation, sent this circular to Austria, who also knew what was in agitation, but kept, it back from Naples, that was in the situation of the audience, and heavy profit to a situation. tion of the audience, and knew nothing at all about it until the knowledge of it had become as useless as it was unnecessary. After some observations from Lord Ellenborough and Lord

Calthorpe, Earl Grey replied, and the question was nege-TUESDAY. The Earl of Liverpool moved the second reading of the Queen's Annuity Bill. The Noble Lord said, it was deemed adviseable that, either, in the case of the Queen surviving her Royal Consort, or living separate from his Majesty, she should be entitled to the same allowance as was proposed on the marriage, to his Majesty, when Prince of Wales.

The Earl of Darnley renewed the observations so often made on the conduct of Ministers towards the Queen, which he considered deserving of censure. He did not feel any particular partiality to her Majesty, nor would he give any opinion on the legality or illegality of inserting her name in the Liturgy. He not approve of her conduct generally.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that no ecusideration on earth should have induced him to advise the omission of the Queen's name, if he had thought it illegal.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, in reference to the observa-tion of the Noble Earl as to the secession of persons from the Established Church, it must arise from political and not from religious motives; but his Grace was ignorant of any such religious motives; but his Grace was ignorant of any such secession. With respect to her Majesty partaking of the prayers of the Church, she already did so, equally as if her name was restored to the Liturgy.

Lord Ellenborough did not see why so large a provision should be made for the Queen. In this opinion the Earl of Limerick coincided.

The Earl of Blessington could not agree with the two Noble Lords; he thought the provision too small; the omission of the Queen's name in the Liturgy was a serious evil.

Lord Calthorpe thought the Government acted wisely in fixing on the present sum.

The Marquis of Landowne deprecated discussion; but though he approved of the present grant to her Majesty, he disapproved of her Letter to the King.

The Bill was read a second time. WEDNESDAY.

The Marquis of Landsdown rose to move for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the state of our Foreign Trade. The Noble Lord was of opinion the internal distress of the country was connected with the state of our foreign trade, but he was not prepared to say that the chief cause of the sufferings of the agriculturists was owing to an excessive production, nor did he think the state of the cora laws had any effect upon that distress, which arose from the state of the home market, labouring, as it did, either under a superabundant supply, or a diminished demand. He thought, however, it was necessary to remove the impediments foreign trade, and the taxes which pressed upon our home trade; each of which operated as restrictions on the capital of the country. After a few more observations, the Noble Marquis moved the Committee.

Lord Ellenborough did not think the relief would be produced by lowering the taxes. The motion was then agreed to.

The Eurl of Liverpool moved for cortain papers connected with our Home Trade, with a view that the House might form a correct judgment on the subject. With respect to the consumption of bread, there was no correct means of obtaining information: it was only of a general chiefly of surmises founded on the importation or exportation of corn. It was impossible, that in contemplation that at some future period, if the price of corn rose to 80 shillings, foreign importation would be allowed, farmers should keep down their corn to 50 shillings per quarter, and thus speculate themselves out of their profits and capital, for fear of distant contingency. It was therefore clear, that no alteration needed to be made in the Corn Laws; and that none which could be made would have the effect of affording any remedy to the distress expenave the effect of anorong any remedy to the districted by agriculture.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. MONDAY.

Mr. Somers Cocks reported from the Truro Election Committee that the sitting Member, William Gosset, Esq. is duly returned. Mr. T. Wilson presented a Petition from the Russia Merchants against any alteration in the timber duties.

Petitions were presented from various places complaining of agricultural distress. The Mait Duty Bill was passed

On the second reading of the Hull Poors' Rates Bill Mr.

Huskisson objected to the Bill as an attempt to introduce into the Port of Hull a poor rate on shipping peculiar to itself, which he considered as becoming a general tendency—he therefore moved that it be read a second time this day six

Mr. Sykes said that Hull was not an insulated case, Sunderland was liable to the rate in point of shipping. After some discussion, it was agreed to put off the second reading till Tuesday sen'night.

Leave was given to Mr. Wharton to bring in a Bill to amend the General Inclosure Act.

In the absence of Mr. Plunkett, Sir J. Newport gave notice that the Right Hon, Gent. would on the 28th instant move the House to repeal the disabilities under which Roman Catholies laboured.

On the motion of Mr. Bennett accounts of the forgeries on the Bank of England, convictions thereon, &c. were ordered to be laid before the House.

Mr. Chetwynd moved for the account of all fines imposed by the Court of King's Bench from 1818 to 1821, and their appropriations, &c. with a view to correct an erroneous opinion as to the disposition of the same.

The Annual Indemnity Bill was brought in and read a first at samber of Petition ers of land in different Counties, complaining of agricultural distress, and praying relief.

The Bill for regulating the proceedings in the Irish Court of King's Bench and Exchequer was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on the 2d of March.

In answer to a question from Mr. Grenfell, respecting the failure in the plan for the new Bank notes of Mr. Applegarth —Mr. D. Gilbert said that it was found that the plan for engraving in steel plates, rendered peculiarly hard, was found to be easily imitated; plans had been sent from all parts of the world, and from America amongst the rest, but he could not say what process had been made towards perfection within the last three weeks.

Mr. Curwes lamented that an impression should go forth

Mr. Littleton, moved for leave to bring in a Bill to regulate distribution of Briefs to Churches, and the collection of monies therein. His object was to correct the abuses in a system which had originated in the piety of our ancestors, and to provide that uo fees be exacted either on churches or fire briefs. Leave was given.

Mr. Denman presented a Petition signed by 7000 inhabitants of Nottingham, stating extreme distress, praying for en-quiry into that distress, and into the proceedings at Manchester.—The Petition contained the most outrageous language against Ministers, and implored the House to impeach them, charged them with conspiracy against the life of the Queen.

On the question for printing the Petition, a long conversa-tion ensued—Mr. C. Wynn objected to the printing of it as a gross insult on the justice of the country.

Major-Gen. Wilson supported the Motion, and contended that there were facts stated in it which it was impossible for any man to deny .- Though no men had been brought to the scaffold in violation of the law, men had been cut down in violation of all law, while the perpetrators, instead of being brought to answer for their enormities with their lives, were richly rewarded. Was it not a actorious fact, and he would say it to the disgrace of the country, that a place of considerable profit was given to the Magisarate who took the lead in the transaction of the 16th of August?

Lord Castlercagh denied that Ministers screened persons guilty of murder, he thanked God! the Constitution did not recognise any such principle—if, however, the Hon. General thought his charge could be maintained, it was a reproach to him not to substantiate it—it might, however, answer the pur-pose of ambitious men like himself to bring forward charges which had not the silghtest foundation.

Sir Robert Wilson said he was prepared to prove the truth of every statement he had made; he now openly charged the parties who had attacked unoffending individuals on the 16th of August with being guilty of murder. He was ready to prove before a competent tribunal.

Lord Castlereagh-I charge the Hon. General to prove it

Mr. T. Wortley was surprised to hear the Hon. General assert that he had the means of proving murder against some parties—why did he not go before the Grand Jury of Lancaster as it was his duty?

Mr. Brougham thought the language of the Petition applied to Ministers and not to the Legislature, and therefore he had no objection to it. With respect to the proceedings on the transactions at Manchester, they had done more than any thing else to shake confidence in the judicial proceedings of

After some further discussion the House divided. For printing the Petition, 64-Against it, 130-Majority against the printing, 66.

Mr. Hobhouse asked the reason why Mr. Johnson confined in prison under a sentence of a Court of Law, had not been allowed to see his wife before she field.—Application had been made to the Secretary of State, security offered and refuse

The Attorney General said that the only way would have been to resist the sentence, but it was a case which could not be recommended for the omission-if the poor woman could have been removed to prison, every facility would have been given for her to have had an interview with her husband.

Mr. Creevey brought the conduct of the Sheriffs of Cheshire before the House. In the Petition it was stated that a Loyal Address had been moved by Mr. T. Cholmondeley and seconded by Sir H. Mainwaring; on that occasion, another Loyal Address was moved by Lord Grosvenor, and seconded by Lord Crewe, but which contained some strong observations on the conduct of Ministers—the second Address the Sheriff said was irrelevent, and would not let it be put, thus depriving the petitioners of their right of being heard. The Hon. Gent. then resolution passed in 1680 by the Honse of Commons to this offect. this effect. "It is, and ever hath been, the undoubted right of the people to petition the King for the redress of all grievances, and to refuse the people this their right of petion, betray the liberty of the subject, and to introduce arbitrary power."—He then referred to the case of the Recorder Jeffries in respect to the Citizens of London, in the same year, when the House agreed that the Recorder had betrayed the right of the subject to petition. After a variety of observations he concluded with moving to refer the Petition to a Select Committee to examine the matter and to report on the same.

Mr. Davenport culogised the conduct of the Sheriff; if the Act was a wrong one, it was an error in judgment, and not proceeding from party prejudice.

Mr. Egerton read a letter from the Sheriff, in which he denied the charge in toto, he had put the original question which was carried by a decided majority, and therefore he hought it was necessary to out the amendment.

Sir E, Knatchbull, Mr. Wilhraham, Mr. Wynne, Ma. Warre and Lord Castlereagh, were of opinion no impropriety of conduct was imputable to the Sheriff; while on the contrary Mr. Phillips, Mr. Curwen, Lord Belgrave, and Mr. A. Moore supported it. On a division the numbers were: For the Motion 65— Against it, 122—Majority against it, 57.

Mr. Grenfell moved for a variety of papers connected with the sale of Ordnance stores, with a view of his ascertaining what private contracts for the sales had been made.

Mr. R. Ward did not object to the motion generally, but certain private contracts had been made, and from the nature e contracts, which from their nature could not be disclosed until the times for payment had expired.—He therefore moved an amendment to except such contracts.—This amendment after some further observations was carried.

Mr Goldburn gave notice that on a future day he should bring in a Bill to dissolve the African Company, and place the forts and property belonging to that Company, in the hands of the Crown. It was not meant thereby to insinuate that the Company had misapplied their funds.

Mr. Marryatt expressed his surprise at the intentions of Government, he thought if the management got into their hands they would not conciliate the natives.

Mr. W. Smith and Mr. Wilberforce were of opinion the Bill was necessary.

Mr. F. Robinson gave notice that on Monday the 26th Inst. be should in a Committee submit a proposition relative to the mode of taking averages of corn. Adjourned. WEDNESDAY.

Lord Althorp brought up the Report of the Committee on the Hedon Election. It stated that the Sitting Member, John Baillie, Esq. was duly elected.

Major-Gen. Wilson asked why Mr. Hunt had been prosecuted for selling breakfast powder? It was very nutritious, and chenp, and his own family were able to make a vary comthat forgery could not be prevented. Unless something could fortable breakfast from what cost them two-pence per pound.

Mr. Lushington said, the prosecution was unavoidable, the law stood.

Lord Althorp obtained leave to bring in a Bill to render you ceedings in County Courts less expensive.

Mr. Hume presented a petition from a person named Macinnon, tried for forgery in 1817, but being insune, was acquitted and sent to Bedlam. The petitlozer now prayed to be discharged from prison, he being perfectly same.—The petition was laid on the table.

Mr. Brougham said, in consequence of the Northern Circuit, he should not be able to bring on the question of Education so early as he intended.

In bringing up a petition from the inhabitants of Langhor. in favour of the Queen, Sir R. Ferguson took occasion to advert to the conduct of the Milan Commissioners, and said, he really believed, after the majorities in this House, he should not not he surprised, if a thanks was proposed to these Commissioners, it would be carried.

Sir J. Mackintosh observed, that the divisions to which his Hon. Friend had alluded would be judged by posterity and the country. A stain had been cast upon the present Administra-tion, by the proceedings of that Commission. He did not wish to wound any one's feelings.

Lord Castletcagh observed, if that was not the Hon. Gent. object, he (Lord C.) diddhink he was practising the most liberal treatment towards the individuals who composed that Commission.

Sir J. Mackintosh rose to move for copies of all correspondence between his Majesty's Government and the British Minister abroad relative to the late proceedings at Naples. The Hon. Gent. commenced by imputing to Austria the most unprincipled aggression in her proceedings against Naples. War had com-menced, and probably by this time was concluded. The object of his motion was to obtain information generally, to ascertain how far Ministers were implicated, from their having been engaged in the late deliberations. The circular of the Allied Powers stated very distinctly the principles of those Powers, which were so very characteristic of the self-elected dictators of Europe. The Manifesto got up at Troppau, and betrayed by their Minister at Hamburgh, exhibited their principles, and shewed whom they considered their vassals, when ther in the shape of Emperors, Kings, Landgraves, or those known by other titles of Sovereignty. These Lords of the human race, with Kings for their vassals, and subjects for their slaves, urged nothing, but that—might constitutes right. Force was the only right they claimed to invade every nation in the civilized world. The Hon. Gentleman then referred to the circular of the Noble Lord, which he considered as of a mysterious nature; but as far as he understood, it appeared to be a charge against the Sovereigns of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, of calling upon this country to adopt measures repug-nant to the principles of the Constitution of this kingdom, namely, of inducing the British Government to bring over foreign troops without the consent of Parliament. From the proceedings which England had adopted in consequence of the Manifesto, and in furtherance of the circular, it was fair to suppose, she was willing to attack Naples, though, from certain circumstances, he could not bring herself to a cause which would commit herself in a war. The Noble Lord had complained of the Carbonari, in this he resembled Murat, who was villing they should meet, provided they did so openly, and let him know the precise time they meant to march against his capital, and overthrow his power. The Hon. Gent. contended, that the conduct of England to Genou, Lucca, Regusa, and Parga, had increased that sect; and then adverted to the pro-bable causes for the opposition of the Allied Powers to the re-volution of Naples. He asked what could the revolution of Naples have to do with Siberia, she could feel no more dread from that event than from an eruption of Mount Vesuvius; the conduct pursued towards Naples was worse than that adopted by the Allies in 1792, towards France. After referring to various historical documents, and commenting at some length upon them, he concluded with moving, &c. Lord Castlereagh did not think the Hon. Gentleman had made out a case to call upon Parliament to furnish the documents he had moved for. It was plain that this country had separated itself from the Allies on the question of Naples; there was no person could doubt, that we were neither a party to the principles put forth by the Allies at Troppau, nor at all implicated in the proceedings against Naples. He (Lord-C.) little expected that Ministers would be charged as they had been by the Hon. Gentleman, not with separating themselves arom the policy of the Allies, for that indeed was the fact, but with not entering into a quarrel with all the great military powers of Europe. Ministers had formerly been accused for such a line of proceeding, and then the cry was, "Why not make peace, and save the country?" The Noble Lord then defended the conduct of the Allies, and declared, that since the peace of 1814, he had not seen the slightest wish on the part of the Allies for any aggrandizement of the territorial rights of other nations, or any wish to denart from the basis laid dome from the policy of the Allies, for that indeed was the fact, but other nations, or any wish to depart from the basis laid down by the Alliance. With respect to Italy, it was impossible for Austria to seek aggrandizement there; indeed she had no such object in view. With respect to the circular, the same sentiobject in view. ments expressed in it had been communicated to Naples immediately after the Revolution, as the views of Great Britain. These views he had privately disclosed to Prince Cimitelli. The Noble Lord contended, that the aim of the Carbonari was, the throwing Italy into one State; they were now properly an Ruropean sect; they openly intimidated the Parliament of Naples, and, in fact, governed the country by force, avowing that their object was to drive the Austrian force out of Italy.

He concluded with putting his direct negative to the motion.

Major-General Wilson contended, that the Carbonari had acted under the sublimest dictates of morality.

Mr. Wilberforce thought, with respect to the argument of his Noble Friend, that no one party to the Holy-Alliance could be permitted by the other Powers to make territorial aggrandizement; it was no avail for it was well known they had a way of each taking a slice.

Colonel Davies defended the conduct of the Neapolitans against the charge of drawing the subjects of other States from

Mr. Tierney considered it extraordinary, that when Europe was to be convulsed, England should stand neuter. The Noble Lord had said, that the Allies were disposed for peace, and disinclined to augment their territorial possessions, but what credit could be gives to this statement, when the great Sovereigns were found, as it were, disturbing the tranquillity of Mr. Robinson, Mr. J. W. Ward, and Mr. Brougham made some observations, and then Sir J. Mackintosh replied. On a division, the numbers were—For the motion, 123—Against it, 194- Majority against the motion, 69 .- Adjourned.

BULL. JOHN

LONDON, FEB. 25.

WE noticed in our last number the gradual diminution of the Queen's partizans, and of the interest which is felt about her. Her cause was three months ago, a pyramid, whose base covered half the land, which has now grown to so small a point that not one man can be found to stand upon it. In the House of Lords, the scene, the very scene, as we were told, of her acquittal and triumph, a Bill of Degradation against her with the approbation even of these who a few since were her supporters.

We call the Annuity Bill, a Bill of Degradation, be cause, great, enormous, and unjustifiable, as we think the sum of fifty thousand a year is, it cannot be denied, that it is infinitely short of what a pure, innocent, and unsullied Queen of England is entitled to receive—it is the dowry stipulated thirty years ago for a Princess of Wales; it is the sum which was offered near two years ago, to the inesgnita Duchess of Cornwall—it is the sum which, before the trial, was tendered in the presumption of her guilt-it is the sum which she refused three weeks ago, in the presumption of her innocence: and yet, this very sum, which, every time it was produced, was a new assertion of her unworthiness of the station of Queen, has passed the House of Commons and the House of Lords, we were going to say unani-mously, but we beg pardon, both in the Lords and in the Commons, it was stated, not that the sum was too degrading, but that it was not degrading enough, and that little more than half the sum would have been a Atter measure of her merits, and a juster criterion of public opinion.

Lord Darnley, who, if we mistake not, had given notice of an intention to move for the restoration of her name to the Liturgy, or in other words, for her restora tion to the throne of Majesty, both in Church and State, appears, if the debate is rightly reported, not only to have given up that intention, but to have ac-quiesced in the Bill of pecuniary degradation; a Bill of degradation so much severer than the former, that it is cruelly calculated to renew the Queen's mortification every quarter-day for the rest of her life. She will not be able to look in the faces of her attendants without seeing, in their paltry and diminished numbers, her degradation from the high and palmy state of a Queen of England; nay, she will not be able to hire a new courier, without bargaining with him for low wages, and avowing, by the necessity for economy, the pecuniary conviction under which she lies.

Indeed, when we weigh impartially, all the bearings of this act, we cannot but do justice to the consistence and good taste of the advice under which she pledged herself to the House of Commons that she never would receive a sum which bore the most undeniable marks being an affront; and which, if accepted, could only be looked upon as the price of shame.

The prudence of that advice may well be doubted by those who think of the Queen as we do; but with her own professions of innocence, with Mr. Brougham's erations of her "not-guiltiness"-with the pride and the parade of an acquittal, which she and her par-tizans so pompously affected, there was no other course left open to her in common decency, or in common sense; and if the Queen be innocent, nay, if we could look at the proceedings as having terminated in an acquittal, we should say, that Mr. Brougham did no more than his duty, in advising his unhappy elient to reject with horror, a proffer, the acceptance of which, would have implied an acquiescence in all the imputations of her accusers.

We shall now see whether the Queen has strength of mind, purity of conecionce, and force of character, to adhere to this refusal; the Whig subscription, notwithstanding the magnificent contributions of Lords Fitzwilliam and Foley, and all the efforts of Mr. Ellice and General Wilson, will, we venture to predict, utterly fail; we hear that Brookes's, that Sanhedrim of the Whigs, has already, with Jewish caution, declined the concern, and that it is new intended to try a parish subscription for the Queen of England, after the manner of Hunt and Cobbett;—but if this be at-tempted we also prophecy that it will end in more complete degradation than even the acceptance of the annuity; it will bring to the test the number and sin-cerity of those who believe her innocent. And the secret of that test we are persuaded will be an affront great and overwhelming in the proportion of the effort which is made, and the extent of the solicitation.

The complete failure of the Queen's case in both Houses of Parliament has naturally driven the Opposition to seek for new means of attack upon the Administration. The affairs of Naples have been selected as the most promising subject; and we have how the Whigs endeavouring to force the Ministerwinto an interference with the Neapolitan Government, from which no earthly advantage could arise. Austria, indeed, careful of her Italian dominions, may be interested in the business; but why we should take a course which would lead us into an unnecessary and fruitless coutest, we leave it to the Whigs themselves to inform us.

As for Sir Francis Burdett, we do not envy him his feelings. Not even the flattering tribute to his merits paid by that great goose Hobbouse, and the cheesemongers, and butchers, and blockheads of Westminster, which he received in his prison the other day, can soothe the anguish of his heart (if he have one) when he thinks of the misery and mischief in which he has involved God knows how many innocent persons.

By a letter from Milan, we are happy to find that one of the assassins of Colonel Browne is in custody; great discoveries are anticipated from this event. Amongst others already made, that the plan of mundering the Colonel was organized at Mantua, is by no means undeserving of notice. It is said, that had the wretches succeeded, they were to have been rewarded with Ten Thousand Francs. We anxiously look forward to further intelligence on this subject, which, we have no hesitation in saying, involves matters of the first importance.

GRAMPOUND DISFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

It will easily be believed that we are no friends to innovation in Church or State, and that we look with has passed, not only without a dissentient voice, but considerable apprehension to any measure founded on a general principle of the necessity of a Reform in Parliamen

We firmly believe that the representation is, up whole, in a better practical state than any of the theories would, if carried into effect, praduce; that is to say, that the present House of Commons expresses the public opinion, and superintends the public welfare with as great a degree of adelity as is compatible with the regular and orderly march of organized Govern-

Any more immediate dependence upon the people would undoubtedly cause a more sudden expression of the public opinion, and a more direct obedience to the popular voice; but every body knows—the sages of Greece and Rome acknowledged it in their republics, and none, indeed, but Major Cartwright, and the sages of Westminster can deny it—that the people, taken collectively, is a depository of panic and passion; and that, if its panics and passions were brought to act saddenly and directly upon its delegates, the House of Representatives would cease to be a deliberative assembly, and would become little more than a parcel of mechanical puppets, the wires of whose action were in the hands of a madman.

The present mode of representation filters the troubled waters before they are brought into use; and that which would have been poison if taken in its turbid state, becomes, by the sedative and clarifying power through which it is transfused, the wholesome sustenance of the political body.

But these general rules are not at variance with particular exceptions; and individual cases of flagrant corruption undoubtedly, in reason as well as in policy, call for punishment and amendment.

It is the general law of England that man shall not be put to death; yet if, in contravention of this general law, a man murder another, the law will execute him: so it may be said that a general principle should be, not to change the present constitution of the Boroughs; but if any Borough shall flagrantly and nefariously puos-titute its own constitution, that Borough may be fairly disfranchised; and it would seem, according to the principle, most right to transfer the right of franchise, so taken from them, to such other persons, as seem, by their palitical situations, entitled to and capable of enjoying to those privileges which the offending Borough had forfeited. Upon these grounds, we do not see what possible objection cambe raised first, to the disfranchisement of Grampound, secondly, to the transfer of that franchise elsewhere.

Much difference of opinion may exist as to the place on which the franchise should be bestowed: some are for adhering to locality, and throwing the right into the Hundred in which Grampound is situated, and, generally speaking, this seems the best, because the least violent, change; but it is contended, that the proximity of that Hundred to so many other Bosoughs, renders this expedient not entirely satisfactory in this

Others would transfer the franchise to one of the Ridings of Yorkshire, thus erecting it into a separate County, and others again are for giving it to Leeds or me other great town.

Both these have their advantages and their difficulties; but there is one other which, though it also has its difficulties, appears to us to have many advantages, and which is well worthy the consideration of the Legislature; we mean the summening two representatives from the Isle of Man.

Our readers would hardly believe the detail of barbarous anomaly which the political state of this Island presents; but the great and flagrant absurdity of having such an Imperium in Imperio, but an Imperium extra Imperium, is obvious to every eye; and since fie union with Ireland it is quite as ridiculous to leave the Idle of Man in the obsolete trammels of its Deemsters and its Keys (such is their barbarous jargon for Judges and representatives) as it would be to leave the Isle of Wight, or the Island of Angleson under the administrative customs of the Belgi or the Druids.

We trust that this proposition, which we draw only time just to throw out, may meet with an attention which we are persuaded it deserves.

THE COURIER AND MORNING POST. WE are very far from wishing to trouble our readers with any thing which concerns ourselves; but the con-duct of the Morning Post and Courier towards John Bull is of a nature which calls for a remark.

These papers are in the habit of quoting from us facts, statements, and original matter, and or saing them, either without any acknowledgment at all, or if with an acknowledgment, with the name of a scrong paper affixed to them.—Our notice of the Duke of Roxburgh's determination not to visit the metropolis-furnished to us exclusively, is quoted by the Morning Post from the Dublin Patriot, and an extract from the speech of Mr. Fox—(the remainder of which we give to-day.) is modestly recommended by the Courier to its readers as having been discovered and exted by itself, without the smallest remark.

That we have rejected some sad trash of verses, and other things which have subsequently in the Post, is no reason why that journal should affix the title of another paper to our original matter which it finds convenient to quote; nor is it because the Courier marches with all the authority of official importance, that it is to assume to itself things which originate in a purely independent, unfeed and unbought publication.

If these papers are sore and angry with us for our asaided success, and choose to pay us in the coin of con-tempt in which they are paid by a large proportion of society, let them leave us alone—they may rest assured we shall never borrow any thing from them; but if they do choose to quote us, they may at least do us the justice to confess their obligations.

the Caronicle annumeces that Mr. Keppel The Morning Chicalocal infinite on that Mr. Keppet Canwa is about to resign the office of deputy to Bergami, and that Mr. Leicester Stanhope is to succeed as Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen. We healtast to believe this; Mr. Stanhope has already given public proof that he is but a silly fellow, but we are still inclined to believe too well of his personal spirit to cre-

But that which neither the Times nor the Chronicle announces, and which, therefore, we believe to be true, is, that a great coolness subsists between Lady Ann

Hamilton and her royal and immaculate mistress.

It is said that this coolness has almost grown to an spen rupture, and that though Lady Ann is in nominel attendance, she sees as little of the Queen as Lady Jersey, or the Duchess of Bedford; we have heard more on this subject than we care at this moment to mention. The quarrel is very a pretty quarrel as it stands, and explanations might only spoil it.

MR. WILBERFORCE.

WE have received letters from all parts of the country, testifying abhorrence of what some call Mr. Wilberforce's "hypocrisy," others his "inconsistency," and the most gentle, his "unhappy error."

One of our correspondents (to whom we beg to express our thanks) has furnished us with ten extracts from Mr. Witherforce's celebrated work of "The Practical View of the Religious System of Professed Christians contrasted with Real Christianity;" and these extracts exhibit, undoubtedly, the grossest inconsistency between the doctrines lately professed by Mr. Wilberforce in Parliament, of submitting moral rectitude to political expediency, and that of his work, the greater part of which is employed in shewing the necessity of maintaining moral and religious opinions, not only in opposition to, but in defiance of, the clamour of the world.

This latter doctrine is, indeed, the great object of the work, and if we were to print all the passages to which our correspondent refers, and those which, on looking over its pages, we have ourselves discovered, it would amount nearly to a reprint of the whole work; and, to say the truth, the book is written in such a rambling snambling desultory style, that it is exceed-ingly difficult to make an extract which shall not be as long as a sermon. We shall, however, select two or three passages, not that they are the strongest, or most in point, but that they are the shortest and most within our limits.

In page 355 of the edition of 1818, the author expresses great anxiety that he should not appear "To melt down the concern of eternity into a mere matter of temporal advantage or POLITICAL EXPEDIENCY.'

In page 359 he exhorts

That the line of demarkation between the friends and number of religion should be made clear; that the separation should be broad and obvious; that he who wishes well to his country ought no longer, in the exigencies of the present times, to hemitate what course he should pursue; and that it is not merely by their personal conduct that men of authority and influence may promote the cause of good morals, but that they should, in their several situations, encourage virtue and discountenance

In page 213 he is very severe on

The false pretenders who endeavour to make themselves universally acceptable and popular; who wear in public the mask of an assumed character, but who possess not the strength and energy of character, which, in contempt of and perseverance in notion. Destitute of proper firmness, they encourage that vice and folly which it is their especial duty to suppress; and it is well if, from their soft acomplying Aumour, they are not often drawn to participate in what is wrong, as well as to connice at it."

In page 190, when treating of the love of worldly estimation, he asks

What real intrinsic essential virtue does there appear to be in a virtue which would have wholly changed its nature and character if Public OPINION had been different? In truth, it is of base extraction and angenerous qualities; it springs from schlausess, from vanity, and less ambition."

And in another place he says, upon the same subject, "That the love of human opplause is manifestly injurious, as it tends to draw down our regards to earthly concerns, and that it is impure to estimate too highly the good opinion and commendations of men."

And finally, (for we are tired of quoting what the event has shewn to be such hypocritical cant) he condemns, by anticipation, the very duplicity of which no man ever gave a more striking example. (page 224.)

"This miserable sophistry" (namely, the propriety of the propriety of the propriety of the propriety of the opinion the world,) "deserves not that so much time should be spent to its refunction; to discern its fallaciousness requires not acuteness of understanding so much as a little common hosames. There is, indeed, no serer mark of a false and hollow heart than a disposition thus to quibble away the clear lajunc-lians of duty and conscience; it is the wretched resource of a dising quous mind endeavouring to escape from convictions, before which it cannot stand, and to evade obligations which it dares not disavow!!!"

By what art, by what subtlety, by what Jesuitry, will Mr. Wilberforce endeavour to reconcile the flagrant contradiction of his practice and his princithe religious and moral obligations which are imposed on man in society, one of the most important to his neighbours is the example which he may give of his reverence for public prayer, and of the cordial sincerity and steadfast faith which he brings

What then would Mr. Wilberforce, in the days of should have had the profane audacity to propose that a struggle between political parties ought to be appeased, by interpolating the holy Liturgy, by confessing that the point is dispute was too thorny and too candidous for the tongues of politicisms and the ground flow months. for the tongues of politicians and the cars of the mob. yet was very fit to exercise the voice of the pricets at the altar, and to mingle itself with the devotions of a people to their Creator?

These are distinctions which we cannot taste; we cannot bear that the only house in England in which a shameless woman is to be received with honour, should be the House of God; and that the only place in which her name could be pronounced without lesita-tion and a blush, should be before the table of the Lord!

Again wessy, how will Mr. Wilberforce reconcile all this? In vain will be whine and complain of our injustice and want of charity; in vain will his and the Queen's partizans accuse us of impiety, because we censure the holy little man. Without venturing to compare the secret intensities of human devotion, we trust we may be allowed to say, that a more sincere reverence than we feel for our holy religion is not to be found in Mr. Wilberforce's breast, nor even in Mr. Wilberforce's book.

The esteem which we have hitherto felt for this gentleman has been altogether founded on a belief of his religious sincerity. His talents are of a very inferior order: he possesses a sweet voice and a voluble tongue; and the unaccountable wavering of his opinions have given him a fictitious degree of importance as he oscil-lated backwards and forwards between parliamentary factions and political parties; but in his public life he has shewn neither the genius which could command others, nor the good sense which could regulate himself.

In the book which we have just quoted, and which owes whatever reputation it has to adventitious circumstances, he shews neither sound human logic, nor pure religious fervor, nor a convincing moral elequence; it is like his speeches and his life—a long series of common place and twaddle; very indistinct, generally unintelligible, confused without variety, involved without discrimination, laboured without being polished, heavy without being solid, and praised, admired, and honored because it is not understood!

That the public opinion of such a man, and of such a book, should have stood so high, is, we think, a re-preach alike to the national taste and the national understanding; but this last flagrant contradiction between his doctrine and his example, will, we think, do more towards lowering the reputation of both to their proper level than any examination or criticism, however acute, or however severe, could have done; and amidst all the frightful consequences which have followed, or may follow, this unhappy discussion about the Queeu, it is a consolation to think that it has at least had the good effect of unmasking the pions, the patriotic, and the literary pretensions of Mr. William Wilberforce, who will be known to posterity as the saint of the nineteenth century who wrote a book against cards and playhouses, and published a speech for admitting a woman convioted of an adulterous intercourse into a station of distinction and honour in the prayers of the church.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM PARIS. PARIS, FEBRUARY 9th, 1821.

Though Bergami has absented himself from Paris, conversation about this singular phenomenon has not ceased. Some anecdotes came to my knowledge the other day about this personage which I shall communicate.

We had in the course of the winter an Italian female of the name of the Marchesa Segrati resident in this city. She was a semi-philosopher, and a semi-litterateur. She had been suremened to England as a witness on the Queen's trial, to testify her knowledge of the services which Bergami had rendered the Queen. At the house of this lady, Bergami sometimes passed his evenings.—I have seen persons who have met him: their accounts correspond with what we have frequently heard, and afford no novelty.

The carriage is which he came to this house was elegant and handsome: it was said to have been purchased for his daughter Victorine; he had always a laquais, and a chasseur bedizened with a profusion of gold and lace.

The Baron himself wore a small round hat in the form of a casquette, or a Bombe at the top, because, as he observed, being tall, a hat made in the ordinary way would inconvenience him in a carriage.

His face, language, and manners, all were common, pourtraying, as a libera! (who cultivated his acquaint-ance) said, the obsequiousness of a laquais. He affected politeness, but smelt so potently of garlick, that even my Prench interlocutor could not sustain his bouffee.

It is said that the Marchesa told him that an illustri-ous lady had learnt his malady without expressing much concern; that absence had diminished some of her affection: she added that the duties imposed upon her by her new situation, prevented her manifesting the same attachment.

Since this intelligence, the Baron has worn an air of sensibility and sadness, which is highly ridiculous, when contrasted with his unmeaning face. He converses much with his daughter, and relates to her the different scenes of their travels in Palestine.

FEBRUARY 16th.

This, perhaps, is the last time I shall mention Berrami; he is by this time at the Barona, the estate given him by the Queen. I saw him leave Paris; he had three carriages, the first was a coach with four horses, which took part of his baggage—his pointers an! spaniels, e chasse, and two servants. In one of the other two carriages, the Baron and his secretary, and two children and the governess, and the third was filled with servants.

It is reported that one of these carriages came to him s a present from London, a few days before his depar-This carriage contained three dressing-cases of much value. When he got to Bondy, the first post from Paris, he discovered that he had left some of his things behind, and a courier was despatched to fetch them, during this time he regaled himself with the landlard of the inn: there is but one other circumstance I shall mention, namely, that his attendants gave out upon leaving Paris, that they shortly expected to return there.

POLTRY.

The following verses, addressed many years ago, to ber Royal Highness the Patacase or Wales, by Mr. Moore, cannot fail, at the present moment, to interest our readers.

> The moral lay, to virtue due, I write, fair excellence, to you. Truth, under fiction, I impart,
> To weed out folly from the heart;
> And shew the paths that lead astray,
> The wand ring nymph from Wisdom's way.

'Tis said of wislow, maid, and wife, That honour is a woman's life; Too fragile sex! who only claim A being in the breath of fame Which tainted, not the quick'ning gales That sweep Sibea's spley vales, Nor all the healing sweets restore, That breathe along Judea's shore.

A traveller, if he chance to stray, May find again the once lost way; Polluted streams again run pure, And despect wounds admit of cure, But women no redemption knows The wounds of honour never class!

If once her feeble bark recede, Or deviate from the course decree In vain she seeks some distant shore, Her berald Folly-flies before; The frewning ports against her close, And shut the wanderer from repose.

Is there no penance to atone, Even for a single error?—None. Whatever fills the teeming sphere Of humid earth and ambient sir With renovation, is indued, And formed to fall and rise removed; The stars no fixed duration know. Wild ocean ebbs again to flow; The sun that mourns approaching night, Refulgent springs with new-born light; The moon repletes her waning face, More brilliant from her late disgrace.

And must poor woman then disown, That change to which a workl is prose ! Must she in constant brightness shine, And ne'er like san or moon decline Alone for ever beight ?-is this What we demand of woman?- Yes. For should the spark of vestal fire, In some unguarded hour expire Shall the black clouds of consoit Dim of your future days, the light? Shall honour's thoughts no more return? Shall virtue's flame no longer hum? We more the rayar'd garden blow. With spring's succeeding blossoms?- No: Pity may grieve, but not restore, And women falls—to rise no more.

MANSION HOUSE CONCERT.

On Thursday, as it should seem, her Majesty goes to a Concert at the Mansion House.

Before our next number is published we shall see what ladies of fashion are under the influence of Alderman Wood, and what ladies of virtue are content, premeditately, to meet the Queen.

BROUGHAMIANA. (II.)

Four Questions for Mr. Brougham.

I. Pray, Mr. Attorney-General, how much did you receive for your visit to Saint Omer's; and what were your expences?

II. Did you not write a letter to a friend, to congratulate him upon the way in which you got the Queen to Saint Paul's, and was there not in that lutter this expression. "I had great difficulty in BRINGING HER TO THE POST SOBER ?

III. Were you not surcharged by the Commissioners of Taxes for not having entered Mrs. Brougham's servants in your schedule, in the month of April: did you not declare upon that paper that you were not married on that day, and that consequently they were not your servants?

IV. When was your child born?

Whenever Mr. Brougham thinks fit to answer the first of these questions, we shall be ready to admit that he is a careful guardian of the public property.

Whenever he answers the second of these questions, we shall doubt his having called the Queen "that Devil, and suspect Doctor Borland of hypocrisy in the declaration of her Majesty's elevation, which he made the other day to Mr. Vizard, who visited and questioned him upon the subject of our Genoese anecdote. Whenever Mr. Brougham answers the third question, we shall admit that he is a fit guardian of public merals, and an excellent person to direct the education of the

And whenever he answers the fourth question we shall be free to allow that the sanction of Mrs. Brougham's name is enough to white-wash, (we use Mr. Brougham's own expression) any doubtful character in Christendom When we say answer, we mean satisfactorily, Supplementary Question for Mr. Henry Brougham. Mr. Brougham, did you, or did you not, in the lobby of the House of Commons, say, when speaking of Alderman Wood, that " excepting the identical animal which chews the thistle, a greater ass does not draw the breath

Second Supplementary Question (rather to Mr. Heavy

Brougham's advantage. Mr. Brougham, did you not recently, at Brindenburgh House, property evince your disgust when the Queen, swearing an oath (which we dare not repeat) did, in the most flagrant, unfeminine, and indecent manner, all-ide to his Majesty, with a reference to HER popularity?

The favour of an answer is desired.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

THURSDAY.

The Queen's Annuity Bill was passed, and carried to the Commons by Baron Garrow and Judge Bayley.

Lord Holland gave notice that he should on Monday move for leave to bring in a Bill to extend the Law of Treason to

The Marquis of Lansdown gave notice of motion for an Address to His Majesty on Tuesday respecting the tranquillity of Europe.

The Royal Assent was given by Commission to the Queen's Annuity Bill, the Mait Duty Bill, &c.

The Earl of Donoughmore presented several petitions from the Catholics of Ireland, and gave notice that he should bring the Catholic question before the House on Thursday, the 8th of March.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY.

Petitions from certain Landholders in various parts of the country were presented, complaining of agricultural distress

In the course of a conversation respecting one from Ashford in Kent, Mr. Ellice made some remarks on the distresses und which the country labours. The Hou. Gent, thought that the state of taxation, the Corn Laws, and the currency were subjects as connected with the cause of that distress, which required the labours of a Committee. The Bullion Committee had erred in not taking those subjects into consideration.

Mr. Grenfell denied that any error had been committed in that meet the Bullion Committee.

that respect by the Bullion Committee.

Mr. Huskisson deprecated discussion on these subjects at the

Mr. Baring thought these subjects, on the contrary, ought frequently to be discussed.

Lord J. Russell called the attention of the House to the proceedings which had taken place at Kilmainhum Meeting, Ireland, when the military were called in by the sheriff, and forcibly turned Lord Clencurry out of the chair. A Petition had been presented to the House from the persons so assembled, praying for an enquiry into the conduct of the sheriff. The Address to the King on that occasion was moved by Lord Howth, and seconded by Lord Frankfort, after which a Mr. Byrne moved an amendment. In the course of his speech he spoke against His Majesty's government; and here, the Noble Lord suid, it was alledged by the sheriff that he was introducing matter totally irrelevant to the business of the day, and was prevented from proceeding, and the sheriff, after some altercation, left the chair. It was then, part of the freeholders who remained placed Lord Cloncurry in the clair, (the sheriff had previously declared the meeting to be illegal, and called upon all loyal subjects to leave the room with him) Mr. Byrne, however, in this state of things, moved an amendment, when a military guard, stationed at the gael of Kilmainham, entered, and compelled Lord Cloneurry and the freeholders to retire. The noble Lord, after this statement, dwelt on the importance of preserving the subjects' right to petition, and the necessity, in a constitutional point of size of institutions are preserved.

in a constitutional point of view, of instituting an enquiry. He moved for the appointment of a select Committee to enquire into the matter of the Petition. Col. Talbet seconded the motion.

Mr. C. Grant, disclaimed any connexion of the Government with the proceedings upon which this petition was founded. No man depresented the interference of a military power more than himself, the same feelings pervaded the whole of the Irish Government, and they had abstained from expressing any opinion upon the charges made against the sheriff. The statement which he had received completely contradicted the charges; it affirmed the address was put and carried without opposition. He further affirmed that he never mentioned the military while in the Court House. The statement that he re-fused to put the amendment was also untrue. After having dissolved the meeting be considered its continuation illegal, and the civil power being inadequate, be then called in the military which was the ordinary gaol guard? The Right Houourable Gentleman, under these circumstances, conceived the Government was not called on to interfere, but the complaining party might find redress in the ordinary courts of justice, nor would the House think it a matter fit for legislative inquiry.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald supported the motion on the ground that as one of the constitutional rights of the people had been invaded, it was a fit subject for the interference of this House

Mr. Ellis was of a contrary opinion, and thought that, at most, if any error had been committed by the sheriff it was an error of judgment.

Sir J. Newport, Sir J. Sebright, Sir J. Mackintosh, were in favour of the motion.

Mr. Bathurst, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Martin (Galway), Mr. Peel, Lord Castlerengh, &c. opposed the motion on the ground stated

On a division the numbers were-For the Motion 90- Against is 124 :- Majority 34.

The Scotch Juries Bill was committed for the 8th of May. Mr. Rice gave notice of a motion respecting the criminal laws of Ireland for the 9th of March.

FRIDAY Mr. Chetwynd gave notice that he should, on the 10th of March, bring the subject of the Vagrant Laws under the consideration of the House. Sir T. Lethbridge gave notice that he should, on the 2d of March, move for a Bill to enable the Trustees of Charities to alienate Lands under certain restrictions.

Mr. Denman presented a Petition from a person named Thomas Davidson, (convicted and sentenced for publishing a gross and blasphemous libel), charging Mr. Justice Best with stopping him in his defence, and imposing on him fines to the amount of 1001, for stating that there was no counsellor who could be found to undertake his defence. The netition went on to state, that there were only two cases, and that in the worst times of our history, when judges exercised such a discretion, viz. Sir W. Ruleigh, who was stopped in his defence, but not fined; and the case of Prynne and others, in the Star Clamber, who libelled the Archbishop of Canterbury, but even then no fine was imposed. Again, in the time of Oliver Cromwell, in the case of Colonel Lilburne, but no fine was levied. In the reign of Henry V. the Lord Cobham was accused of heresy, and in defence called the bishops infidels, the judges however did not fine him. The Hon. Gent. stated, that the petitioner had thus been hindered from making his defence. It was true the fines were remitted, Mr. D. did not mean to bring any thing like a charge against the Judge. He moved that the petition be received.

Mr. Hobbouse seconded the motion.

The Attorney General conserved, that the question respecting the conduct of Judge Best had been discussed when a motion for a new trial was moved. The libel in question contained a declaration that the Bible contained nothing "but lies, blasphemies, and absurdities." With a view to prevent the repetifrom of these blasphemies the fines had been imposed. It was for not desisting that he was fined, and not for saying that he could not find a counsellor to plead his cause. The defendant had still continued to behave in the most insulting manner, had still continued to behave in the most insulting manner, holding up his hand in a menacing attitude, and saying to Judge Best, "Here is the key of the dungeon, send me to it if you like, I will proceed in my defence." The fines were remitted upon the summing up of the Judge. He could not see any ground the petitioner had for coming to the House.

Mr. Creevey called the learned Judge an intemperate and political Judge, and said that he had acted from resentment.

Mr. Scrieant Onslow appealed to the House whether the Hon. Gent. was not disorderly.

The Solicitor Coneral thought the Hon. Gent. when he made such grave charges should substantiate by evidence (Mr. C. denied that he had made any) He was glad then that he re-tracted his error. The Hon, and Learned Gent, then defended the Learned Judge at some length, from the imputation at-tempted to be cast upon his character.

Mr. Lockhart felt satisfied that the conduct of the Learned Judge after the explanation he had heard was perfectly correct.
A long and desultory discussion took place in which
Mr. Scarlett, Sir F. Blake, Lord Castlereagh, Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Bernal, &c. &c. took part. On a division, the numbers were—for receiving the petition, 37—Against it, 64—Majority against the petition, 27.

A discussion was afterwards entered into, on a motion of Mr. Hume's, for an Address to the King, for an Abstract of the Revenue and Expenditure of the Ionian Islands; in which the Hon. Geut. contended, the High Commissioner, Sir T. Maitland, enjoyed considerable emoluments, and that many of the subordinate officers were provided for at a considerable expence. This, however, Mr. Goulburn shewed to be incorrect; and so far from the High Commissioner living in a palace, and enjoying 2,000l. a year, his income was very limited, and he was very badly lodged, living only in a bed-room and a sitting-room.—
The motion was agreed to.—Adjourned to Monday.

NAPLES, Jan. 31 .- The official journal gives the following account of a letter from the King:

"'The King enters largely into a detail of the extreme kindness of his reception by the Emperors; of the humidity of the climate, and the heat of the stoves, by which his cold has been increased. His Majesty adds, that he has nothing of interest to communicate as to political affairs, but that the re-union of the Italian Princes leaves room to hope, with the Divine assistance, for the adoption of a better system, in the affairs of Italy, and confirmation of the tranquillity of Europe.

"General Pepe, on the 29th, under the title of the Order of the Day, congratulates the National Guard, both horse and fool. "'I' It the chances of war,' says he, 'should lead the enemy into your neighbourhood, remember that the Neapolitans have more than once defended their fine country, and that Saragossa, which does not contain the tythe of the population of Naples, resisted for a long period the attacks of two powerful French

"LAYBACH, Feb. 2.—The Austrian army passed the Po on the 28th and 29th of January, and is advancing upon Naples by three different routes. Forty thousand men will first advance to the frontiers, who will announce, in case of resistance, that they will be followed by 80,000 more. His Majesty the King of Naples has addressed a Proclamation to the inhabitants of the Two Sicilies, in which he orders the immediate dissolution of the Parliament. He also calls on them to receive the Austrians as friends, and promises, on his return, to give them a Constitution. ### I.AW INTELLIGENCE

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, FRB. 21.

The King v. J. Hunt.

This was an Indictment against the proprietor and publisher of the Examiner newspaper, for a libel on the House of Commons, published in his paper of the 24th of July.

'The alleged libel, after describing the majority of the Members as greedy place-hunters, pensioners, and needy adventu-rers, asserted that the House contained a far greater number of public criminals than public guardians, &c. &c. This was the libel complained of.

The defendant read a long written defence in which he dis claimed any other object than the public benefit in the libel.

The Jury retired and after some time returned into Court to consult the Judge as to whether it was necessary malice should be proved to constitute the offence.

The Judge said that must be inferred from the effect which his act was likely to produce. The Jury then retired, and in a few minutes returned with a verdict of Guilty

The King v. Fletcher and O'Brien.

This was an indictment against the defendants, charging them with conspiracy to excite disaffection in his Majesty subjects, by circulating inflammatory hand-bills. The circumstances of the charge have already been before the public. Fletcher, who has absconded, did not plead to the indict-ment, and the Jury had only to try Mr. O'Brien. The case was stated by Mr. Pearson, who in support of the prosecu-tion but in several hand-bills, which had been traced to the possession of Fleicher. Seale, the printer, was examined, for the purpose of implicating the defendant O'Brien; but be only proved that a person wh m he believed to be the defendant was seen at his office with Fletcher in July last. He afterwards went, by the desire of Mr. Charles Pearson, the Attornev. to Craven-street, to identify the defendant O'Brien.

Several other witnesses were called, but they failed to estab-lish the fact that O'Brien was implicated with Fletcher in circulating the hand-bills. Some others proved that Fletcher was in the habit of visiting at O'Brien's house, and on one occasion where he had circulated the bills he was traced thither.

Mr. Scarlett was heard for the defendant. He contended that there was no proof that Mr. O'Brien was in the slightest way concerned in the transaction.

He called the Duke of Bedford, Lords Holland and Erskine,

&c. who spoke to the character of O'Brien down to 1806, and who thought him incapable of writing a placard of the description alluded to. After an able charge from the Judge, the Jury acquitted the defendant.

The King v. T. Hibbert, Esq.

This was a question to try the insunity of the defendant, a gentleman of fortune in Wimpole-street. A great number of witnesses were called to shew that he had on various occasions committed acts which proved that his mind was not in a sound state; that he had frequently broken open rooms to get at his mother and sister, whom he beat. Many other circumstances were proved. On the other side, it was endeavoured to be shown that he was in sound mind, but this failed, and the Jury found for the Crown, thereby establishing the insanity.

TO JOHN BULL.

Sir,-In answer to some conversation of Mr. H. Sumner's a few nights since in the House of Commons. relative to the Queen's debts, Mr. Alderman Wood stated the Queen was not in debt one farthing: if you think it worth while to enquire at Stodart's the Coachmaker, in South Audley-street, I think you will find the Queen is in debt there little short of 20001, and to her Silversmith, whose name I do not recollect, a sum nearly as large.—I am, your admirer and reader,—

P. S. am, your admirer and reader,— February 16th, 1821.

TO JOHN BULL.

SIR.—Your correspondent Retrospect, in quoting part of the speech of the Right Hon. C. Fox in your last paper, (and which the Courier has borrowed from you, without even the grace of acknowledging it), hardly did the cause justice, for I think the preceding part of the harangue equally strong and forcible with that which he extracted; if you can give it a place I enclose it.

Yours, ROBERT HALLAM. Bristol, Feb. 20th, 1821.

"Notwithstanding what the honourable member, who spoke last, has been pleased to use relative to the divided views, and the divided interests of the Commons and the people, he has not been able to convince me, that the authority of this house is not the best security of the national freedom; nor able to convince me how our welfare can possibly be separated from the welfare of the public.

"The honourable gentleman is pleased to say, that the voice of this house is not the voice of the people, and sets the language of clamour without doors in opposition to our deliberations, as if we were not particularly appointed by the constitution, the only revealers of the national mind, the only judges of what ought to be the sentiments of the kingdom. I say, sir, what ought to be, because many laws are highly necessary for the public safety, which excite the discontent of the people. If we were never to pass a law, till it obtained the sanction of popular approbation, we should never have a settled revenue to support either the establishment of our domestic policy, br to defend us against the invasions of a foreign enemy. The uninformed zealots, who seem animated with an enthusiastic love for their country, generally charge us with having sold them to a minister; and we are accused of venality for imposing burdens, which we know to be absolutely necessary, and to which we ourselves, if the House of Commons is supposed an assembly of the first property in the state, must always be the largest contributors.

"It will possibly appear strange, that a representative of the people should not deem it more meritorious to comply with the wishes of his constituents, than to counteract them; and it may possibly be urged, that it is his duty, upon all occasions, to act in conformity to those wishes, however repugnant they may be to the sense of his own conviction. I will not differ with the honourable gentleman about the idea he annexes to his term of the people; I will, FOR ARGUMENT SAKE, allow, that nine tenths of the people are this moment in opposition to government. But I shall at the same time insist, that we have higher obligations to justice, than to our consti-tuents: we are chosen the delegates of the British elec-tors, sir, for salutary, not for pernicious purposes; to guard, not to invade the constitution; to keep the pri-vileges of the very freemen we represent, as much within their proper limits, as to controll any unwarrantable exertion of the regal authority. We are bound to promote their true interests in preference to the dearest desires of their hearts, and the constitution makes us the sole arbiters of those interests, notwithstanding the IMAGINARY INFALLIBILITY OF THE PEOPLE.

"To shew the propriety of this reasoning, let us suppose that the people, instead of this mixed monarchy, which we celebrate as equally the pride and envy of the universe, should instruct us, their representatives, to introduce a democratical form of government; should we act as good subjects to our king, or as faithful guardians to our country, if we complied with so dangerous an advice? We have sworn to maintain this constitution in its present form; to maintain the privileges of parliament as a necessary part of that constitution, and neither to encroach upon the legal jurisdiction of the peers, nor the just prerogatives of the sovereign. Shall we then do what we are sensible is wrong, because the people desire it? Shall we sacrifice our reason, our honour, and our conscience, for fear of incurring the popular resentment, and while we are appointed to watch the Hesperian fruit of liberty with a dragon's eye, be ourselves the only slaves of the whole community?

" Perhaps the honourable gentleman will tell me, that nothing but the "soul of absurdity" could suspect the people of a design against their own happiness: sir. I do not suspect the people of any such design, BUT I SUS-PECT THEIR CAPACITY TO JUDGE OF THEIR TRUE HAPPINESS; I know they are generally credulous, and generally uninformed; captivated by appearances. while they neglect the most important essentials, and always ridiculously ready to believe, that those men, who have the GREATEST REASON from their extensive property, to be anxious for the public safety, are always concerting measures for the oppression of their own pos"It is urged, with great gravity, by many gentlemen in opposition, sir, that the House of Commons, as the creatures of the people, have no right whatever to exercise an authority over their constituents. This position, Mr. Speaker, breathes the spirit of freedom with a vengeance, for it lays the axe to the root of all subordination at once, and puts an entire end to the whole system of constitutional government."

TO THE EARL OF ESSEX.

My Lord,—Upon reading the Report of your Lordship's speech in the House of Lords at the close of the Queen's Trial, I was much struck with the dissimilarity in the sentiments therein contained, from the account your Lordship had previously given in your neighbourhood, of your interview with the Princess of Wales at Lyons.

The statement of this interview, as given by your Lordship, was, that, upon your paying a visit to her Royal Highness at Lyons, one morning, you were received by her in her bed-room, and upon her Royal Highness informing you, that she was in daily expectation of a visit from Mr. Canning, who was coming with a communication from Government to her, you assured her Royal Highness of its being a mistake; that you had seen Mr. Canning at Paris, who was there with his family; and that he was charged with no mission to her Royal Highness.

charged with no mission to her Royal Highness.

During this conversation Bergami entered the room, whom her Royal Highness addressed with "Bon jour, Mons. le Barou;" and at the same time introduced him as such to your Lordship; that he was a tall handsome man, with black hair and mustachios, with a black cravat and blue surtout buttoned close up under his chin, and you blue surtout buttoned close up under his chin, and you thought you saw in him a resemblance of the Prince of Wales when young; that the impression upon your Lordship's mind was, that although her Royal Highness wished him good morrow in your presence, as if she had not seen him before, you had no donbt but she had wished him good night in that very room where you were received. There is only one question to be put to your Lordship. Why this part of the detail of your interview. Lordship, Why this part of the detail of your interview, which, previous to the Queen's trial, you gave to all your neighbours and friends round Cashiobury Park, was suppressed in your speech in the House of Lords? Which, my Lord, are we to believe, your declaration at Cashiobury, or at Westminster?

Perhaps this question may be answered by another; were not your Lordship invited to dine with the Queen, and did you not declare, that though you could vote for her you could not dine with her? And did you not, by way of excuse for your absence, invite the Austrian Ambassador for the same day to Cashiobury; and when, he (being engaged elsewhere,) failed you, had you not recourse to some other similar pretence to avoid the destined honour? In short, then, has your Lordship ever seen the Queen since she introduced you to Bergami in her bed-

MR. CHRISTIE AND MR. SCOTT.

A duel was fought last Friday se'nnight at nine o'clock at night between two gentlemen of the names of Christie and Scott; the parties met at Chalk-farm, by moonlight, attended by their seconds and surgeons, and after exchanging shots without effect, at the second fire Mr. Christie's ball struck Mr. Scott just above the hip on the right side, and passing through the intestines lodged in the left side. Mr. Scott fell, nearly doubled by the wound, and was removed to the Chalk-farm tavern.

This meeting took place in consequence of the following circumstances:—Mr. Lockhart, the reputed author of Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk, having been personally and violently attacked in the London Magazine, a work and violently attacked in the London Magazine, a work professedly edited by Mr. Scott, came to London for the purpose of obtaining from Mr. Scott an explanation, apology, or meeting.

Mr. Scott, as we understand, declined giving any thing of the sort, unless Mr. Lockhart would first deny that he was the editor of Blackwood's Magazine, this Mr. Lockhart did not consider it necessary to do, and their correspondence ended with a note from Mr. Lockhart, containing very strong and unqualified expressions touching taining very strong and unqualified expressions touching Mr. Scott's personal character and courage; to meet this Mr. Scott published his account of the affair, which differed very little as to facts; but a circumstance oc-curred subsequently, which placed the matter on a different footing.

Mr. Lockhart in his statement, which was printed, says that a copy of it had been sent to Mr. Scott; whereas it appears that the statement generally circulated contained a disavowal of Mr. Lockhart's editorship of Blackwood's Magazine, which the copy of his statement actually sent to Mr. Scott did not. Mr. Scott therefore says, that in withhelding from him the disavowal he asked, he prevented the meeting, and that in affixing to the statement the declaration that a copy of that statement had been for-warded to him (Mr. Scott) Mr. Lockhart had been guilty of falsebood.

This is met by the other party. who say that though Mr. Lockhart would own to the world that he was not the Editor of Blackwood's Magazine, he never would say that he was not the Editor to Mr. Scott, because Mr. Scott, as the avowed Editor of a Magazine, which if not so popular is more bitter, had no right to demand such an explana-

It appears to us that the error arose in leaving the peragraph standing which states that a copy of the statement had been sent to Scott. Mr. Scott's attack produced a reply from Mr. Christie, Mr. Lockhart's friend, which reply produced a challenge from Mr. Scott, which Mr. Christie accepted, and at Mr. Scott's suggestion agreed to meet him at nine o'clock at night—an unusual hour for such appointments.

The result of the meeting we have mentioned, but we al ild add that it appears that Mr. Christie did not fire at Mr. Scott in the first instance, but that on the second shot fired in self-defence, he levelted his pistol at him, and too truly hit his mark.

Mr. Lockhart is one of his Majesty's Counsel at the Scotch bar, and son-in-law of Sir Walter Scott, bart. Mr. Christie is a young barrister of Gray's Inn.

MELANCHOLY AFFAIR.

Few things have occurred which have more deeply interested us than the dreadful death of Mr. Harvey Aston.

—It seems as if a fate hung over the name—and we grieve, if possible, the more, because we dare not lament him who is gone.

Mr. Harvey Aston, the report says, had long been intimate in the house of a certain Countess, where at length his visits were forbidden, owing, as it should seem, to the too evident attention paid to one of her Ladyship's daughters—subsequent to this prohibition, Mr. Aston prevailed upon the young Lady to elope with him to Genoa, to which place her mother followed, and having overtaken, brought her back—this produced the melancholy catastrophe.

There are many versions of this story, some say that two of the young Ladies of the family have fallen victims—others, that only one has suffered; and others again, impute no blame to the young Lady, but on the contrary, assert that her honour and innocence remain unimpeached and unimpeachable.

We trust this may be the case—the young Lady is in some degree a public character, and therefore a double interest is excited by the adventure. She is the daughter of Lady Oxford, about whom it may be remembered, Sir Francis Burdett (now in prison) instituted a suit against Mr. Scott, her Ladyship's brother, on account of a bond which in an effort to save his popularity, he was foolish enough to grant.

It is, in truth, a melancholy business, and we shall, in pity, draw a veil over all the circumstances.

MISCELLANEOUS.

BRIGHTON, Feb. 20.—Grand Ball at the Pavilion.—In consequence of the invitations by Royal command, the company began to assemble last night at nine o'clock, to be present at a ball given by the Sovereign; and most important had been the arrivals to share in the same honours, and partake of the same pleasures in the course of the day. The carriages, in quick succession, drove up to the Palace entrance in Castle-square, where all within alighted, the grand entrance and hall, making part of the west front of the stately structure, not being yet completed. The bustle excited for about an hour was considerable; but it was replete with interest; the apparent confusion had method in it; not an accident occurred, though the crowd in Castle-square was great, through which the different vehicles had to pass and repass. Even the coachman's "Make-way" exclamations, were but little heard; and loyal greetings, cheering expressions, and good behaviour with the spectators, constituted the regulating order of the night.—The yellow drawing-room, which opens into the music-room, formerly distinguished as the Egyptian or long gallery, was the batl-room on this occasion; and the ball was opened soon after ten o'clock, by Prince Esterhazy, who led off the Hon. Miss Seymour. About thirty couple followed; and never had the Goddess of the light fantastic toe more cause to pride herself upon the grace, lively action, and personal accomplishments of her most polished votaries.—The blue room, that opens into the banquetting-room, which, with the Egyptian gallery, &c. were magnificently lighted up, was appropriated for refreshments, and tempting was the character it displayed. To be brief, every thing that could delight the eye and enchant the senses, was present at this entertainment, and most exquisite was the enjoyment afforded. —Among the distinguished company were, the Princess Augusta, the Austrian and Russian Ambassadors, Earl of Egremont, Earl and Countess of Chichester, Earl and Countess of Warwick, Sir R. and Lady Wigram, &c. &c. The Duke of Dorset, the Duke of Montrose, and the Marquis of Graham, Count and Countess Lieven, &c. left the Palace this morning for London.

KING'S LEVER.—On Friday his Majesty held a Levee at Carlton House, which was splendidly attended. The Foreign Ministers, the chief Officers of State, &c. were present. Among the presentations, which were numerous, was Mr. Samuel Bagster, by the Archishop of Canterbury, who had the honour of presenting to his Majesty a copy of the new and beautiful edition of the Common Prayer, in eight languages; which his Majesty received most bered in that city. The grand front of the building was brilliantly illuminated with a very large star, G. R. and crown, decorated with laurel. The rooms were lighted in a most splendid manner; on one side of the banqueting-room, a beautiful whole length transparency of the or trait of His Majesty, in his full robes, was placed up. The company were received in the vestibule by the Steward, and introduced to the octagon and ball-room, both appropriated for dancing. The ball was kept up with spirit till one o'clock, when the company, about six hundred and fifty in number, partook of a sumptuous supper, during which the North Somerset band played favourite pieces of music. The first tost after supper favourite pieces of music. The first toast after supper was, "the King, and God bless him," which was drank with enthusiasm and encored, whilst the band played the national anthem. After the banquet dancing was resumed, and continued until five o'clock in the morning, when an elegant breakfast was served, which concluded the festivities. The dresses of the ladies were elegant, and the show of jewellery extremely rich. THE NAVY.—The following Lieutenants have been promoted to the rank of Commanders:-

J. Brigstoke, J. Johnson, Edward Spanshott, Peter Salmon, William Chapman, J. P. Baker, James Gordon (A), Francis

The following singular circumstance occurred on the evening the King was at Drury-lane Theatre:—A Gentleman of Clerkenwell, who was in the crowd, missing his watch, seized a man whom he supposed had robbed him, and challenged him with the offence. The fellow immediately took from his pocket a watch and seals, which he gave up, and was suffered to depart. On returning home, the Gentleman, to his astonishment, found he had left his own watch hanging up in his bed-room! The watch and seals given to him are supposed to be worth 50 guineas.

ORIGIN OF THE NAME OF CHARING CROSS.not generally known, that the name "Charing Cross," originated from the fond epithets bestowed by Edward I. on his beloved Queen, to whom no less than fifteen crosses were erected, and from the prevalence of the French language at that time; Charing being nothing more than a corruption of Chere Reyne, often applied by Edward to his Queen; of course, the cross gave the name to the spot. A similar corruption occurs in Blanck Apple Court, in the city, which has long been called Blind Chapel Court; and a district near St. Catherine's, first called Hammes and Guisnes, being inhabited by people from the neighbourhood of Calais, has long borne the curious appellation of Hangman's Gains.

A Court of Common Council was held on Thursday at Guildhall to receive the Report of the Committee for General Purposes, on the Orphans' Dues, and Metage on Coals. Sir William Curtis was appointed Collector and Treasurer to the Orphan Society, by the Court of Alder-men in the year 1810, and gave a bond for the due execution of the office; and in the year 1820, the Court of Aldermen took a new bond from him for the discharge of the same duties, under circumstances that called for inquiry. It was desired that the Report made bythe Committee for General Purposes on the subject, be read.—Sir William Curtis objected to the competency of this Court to take cognizance of his duties—the Court of Aldermen were the proper tribunal to whom he would only render an account. The Report was after some discussion agreed to.

EBINBURON, FEB. 12.—Between nine and ten o'clock, an alarming fire broke out in the still-house of Sunbury distillery, Bell's Mills. By the exertions of the firemen, the police, and persons on the spot, the flames, were prevented from communicating with the other extensive premises, otherwise the loss would have been very great. A very melanchely accident oc-curred during the fire to six persons who had got on a wooden bridge on the outside, which communicated from the still-house to another part of the distillery. It having been found necessary to cut the bridge in two, to prevent the fire from reaching to the opposite side, these persons had gone too near the egsi, when the bridge gave way, and precipitated them from a height of three stories among stones and rubbish. Three were slightly bruised, but the other three were so severely burt, that the life of one of them is despaired of. Two were carried to the Rayal Infirmary, and the third to his own house. A detachment of the 7th Fusileers from the Castle were on duty to preserve order.

Exergs.—An plarming fire broke out at the iron-foundery of Mr. Huxbam, in Ewing's-lane, which totally destroyed the foundery and its machinery. Dowton, of Drury-lane Theatre, has been pluying here with great success: his benefit took place last Briday.

A Coroner's Inquest was held on Friday, at the Red Lion, Cavendish-street, Cavendish-square, on the body of Master Frederick Eviti, a child of four years of age, who was unfor-tunately killed by felling out of a one pair window. The deconsed was the one of a gentleman occupying the first floor of 184, Oxford-street; the deceased was standing on a chair near the window, the such of which was incautiously left open, and whilst the mail went to fetch her cloak and bonnet to take him out to walk, he leaned over the window heyond his balance to see something that was passing, and fell into the streat.—Verdiet Accidental Death.

CAUTION TO SABBATH-BREAKERS .- On the 24th ult. 17 young men in the parish of Scawby were convicted by the Ma-gistrates at the justice-room in Brigg of playing at feet-ball on the Subbath-duy, and were sentenced to pay a fine of 3s. 4d. each, or to stand in the stocks for three bours. One of them paid the fine, and the remaining 16 were alternately placed in the public stocks.

Just published, in 2 vols. 8vo. price 11. 8s. in boards, the FOURTH EDITION, much enlarged and improved, of NATURE DISPLAYED in her Mode of Teaching Languages so Man; being a new and infallible method of acquiring Languages with unparalleled rapidity, deduced from the Ausiysis of the Human Mind, and consequently suited to every capacity. Adapted to the Fronch. To which is prefixed, a Development of the Plan of Tuition: differing entirely from every other, so powerful in its operation, and so very economical, that a LIBERAL EDUCATION can be procured even by the poorest of mankind; thus furnishing the great desideratum of enabling nations is arrive at the highest degree of mental perfection.

desideratum of enabling nations so arrive at the nignest acgree or mediai perfection.

By N. G. DUFIEF,
Author of the "Philosophy of Language," and of the "New Universal Protocuncing Dictionary of the Freuch and English Languages," &c. Extract from the Report of the Committee of the Calcutts School-Book Society, read at the First Annual General Meeting of the Subscribers, held at the Town-hall of that City:

"Your Committee has, in canclusion, to advert to a very remarkable work, which has strongly attracted their attention, entitled, "Nature Displayed," &c. by Mr. N. G. Dinfef. The truths of most importance to mankind commonly lie long dormant, acknowledged indeed, but not duly prized; till some one, gifted with common sense and aggacity surpassing those of his cotemporaries, points out to the world their momentous practical uses and corollaries.

"Mr. Budge has bimself observed, what is indeed sufficiently obvious, that his manner of teaching a language is not suited to the case of the out practical uses and corollaries.

Mr. Bufaef has binnelf observed, what is indeed sufficiently obvious, that his manner of teaching a language is not suited to the case of the French only. It is for this lustitution steadily to keep the principle in view, and seize opportunities, as they occur, of applying it to all the languages within its sphere of operation and usefulness.

"Your Committee, adverting to the uncommon sperit of the work, and considering its dissemination as calculated to produce just ideas on the subject of solool-books, and as furnishing an admirable model for the preparation of many, have accuraged a proposed re-publication in Calculate, by subscribing for seventy copies," &c.

I am now so thoroughly consinced that this system contains all the original elements of tuition, which are grounded on the very nature of the understanding listelf,—elements which have for the greatest part escaped attention, that, aximated with the same spirit which made the mathematical in the interest contains all the progress of science, I do hereby CHALLENGE the Quarterly and Edinburgh Reviews, any all the instrustors of youth in the United Kingdom, to point out what elementary principle of education has been onitized or overlooked; and in what respect this system can be at variance with the faculties of the mind, by bringing into action every mental and physical organ engaged in the learning of language, and directing the whole, with simultaneous energy, towards one and the same end.*

whole, with simultaneous energy, towards one and the same end.*

N. (1. DUFIEF.

This method, by being rendered more powerful, which can easily be done by following up the principle on which the whole system hinges, would in a short-time make the language to be taught supplease the native language, by rendering the furner more natural and familiar to them than the latter, the inducance of which would be continually diminishing. A conqueror might even, by this means, exting wish the language of the conquered, and substitute any other suited to his political views. But God forbid that such a measure, should ever be resurted to, with the help of the means afforded by this work!

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS. MONDAY.

A Petition was presented by the Rarl of Limerick, from the City of Limerick, complaining of agricultural distresses, and praying the House to encourage the introduction of Irish produce and manufactures into every part of the united kingdom.

Lord Holland brought in a Bill, founded on the Act of William and Mary, respecting the Law of Treason, with a view of extending the provisions of that Act to Ireland; an Act which provided, that in cases of treason, two witnesses should be necessary to convict; as the law at present stands, one only being requisite.

The Earl of Liverpool expressed his satisfaction at the introduction of this Bill, and said, nothing would tend more to conciliate Ireland than assimilating the laws of the empire.—
The Bill was read a first time.

TUESDAY

A petition was presented by the Bishop of St. David's, from the Clergy of the Archdeacoury of Stafford, against any alteration in the existing laws respecting Catholics. WEDNESDAY.

The Lord Chancellor stated the case to the House of two individuals claiming the Earldom of Strathmore, and gave notice of his intention to move to refer a Petition, present the House on the subject, to the Committee of Privileges. THURSDAY.

The Annual Indemnity Bill went through a Committee. The Marquis of Lansdown presented two petitions from the Owners and Occupiers of Land in Somersetshire, complaining of Agricultural distress and praying relief.—Laid on the table. - Adjourned.

FRIDAY.

The Indemnity Bill was passed.
On presenting a Petition from certain occupiers of land in Suffolk, complaining of Agricultural Distress,

Lord Calthorpe believed that the evil arising from foreign importation was slight compared to the warehousing system.

The Earl of Liverpool admitted the importance of the consideration whether that system ought to be preserved; a Committee of the other House had decided that no abuses existed in it.

A Petition was presented from certain noblemen and gentry of the county of Dublin, complaining of the introduction of military at a late meeting in that city.

The Marquis of Lansdown moved an Address to the King, thanking him for laying before the House the Despatch sent to the British Ministers abroad, respecting the revolution at Naples; and expressive of the satisfaction of this House that His Majesty is not a party to the proceedings against that country; and praying that His Majesty would direct his ministers to use all the influence in their power to prevent or repair the evil consequences resulting from the conduct of Austria, &c. The Noble Marquis entered at great length into the proceedings of the Ministers on which he commented the proceedings of the Ministers, on which he commented (with, as he observed, the full approbation of the people of England); charging them with delusion in not communicating the Circular of the Allies to Parliament. He condemned the principle of unsheathing the sword to attack independent states; no power had right to interfere with the proceedings taken by the Ncupolitan people; with respect to the sect of the Carbonari working in the dark, he for one, living in a land of liberty, where he should feel the existence of a political sect as evil, yet must admit that there were countries where the people might be obliged to have recourse to sects, the Government not being friendly to liberty, and inclined to despotism. But it seemed a standard in the present day was to be erected for Monarchial Governments. He then traced the history of the Carbonari, to the time of the Emperor Leopold, so that it was not of modern date.

Earl Batkurst thought the Address went to pledge this House to declare that the country should not act upon neutrality; not one argument had been adduced to shew the necessity of abandoning such a system, and he should oppose the motion.

Lord Ellenborough considered such a movement about to be or adopted by Austria dangerous to the tranquility of Europe. He supported the motion, as did the Earl of Darnley, Lord Holland, &c.

The Earl of Liverpool defended the conduct of Ministers in the course they had taken.

The House at length divided on the motion—Contents 23,

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY.

Petitions from Wells, in Somersetshire, praying for an amendment of the Penal Code; and from Somersetshire, Monmouth, Reyston, and Kent, complaining of agricultural dis-tress were presented.

A petition was presented from certain inhabitants of the City of London, against the London Bridge Bill.

Petitions from Yarmouth, the Ship-owners of London, Newcastle, Aberdeen, Sunderland, and from the Town of Stockport, praying that no alteration may take place in the foreign trade.

The Lord Advocate of Scotland brought in a Bill for regulating the Practice of the Court of Session in Scotland.—Read a first time.

A petition was presented by the Sheriffs, from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of London, praying to be heard by Council against the London Bridge Bill.—Ordered.

the second reading of the Scotch Admiralty Compensation Bill.

Mr. Creevey moved an amendment that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, on the ground of its being a contingent prospective measure.

The Lord Advocate contended, that compensation was due to those officers whose places might be abolished.

After some conversation, the further consideration of the Bill was postponed, on the motion of Mr. Grant, to a future day. CORN AVERAGES .- Mr. F. Robinson moved the Order of the Day for a Committee of the whole House, to consider the resent mode of taking averages, with a view of correcting the errors in the present mode. The Hon. Gent. then said, the present law was contained in four Acts of Parliament, comprising 120 clauses; the last of these Acts repealed indirectly a part of the former Acts. His object, therefore, was to abolish all these laws, and to collect into one Bill, all that should be found desirable to retain, or to add. He then took a view of the present mode of taking averages by districts, taking the first average in tewns, then the amount of the averages of each town was added, and the total was divided by the number of towns, which formed the average of the particular district; in like manner the number of districts was divided, and the divi-sion formed, of course, the general average. The evil effect of the present mode was, that it allowed each individual town a considerable influence in forming the district average, by obconsiderable innuence in forming the district average, by outaining fletilious returns of that town. To remedy this evil, he should propose, that in future, the system of districts should be abolished, and that of taking the averages by counties be substituted, and to divide one by the other. This, he conceived, would either check or prevent the present deceptive system.

It would be observed, that the counties of Kent, Surrey, and Resex, formed at present no part of the districts, the average for London being considered as the average for these counties, he would suggest, to add these three counties; he thought too that the King in Council should have power to alter the town. He should also propose to increase the salaries of the inspec tors to 301. a year, not to fall on the country. The appointment of the principal officers to be in the Board of Trade object of the present Bill, was, to take in the lrish corn, which had altogether been left out of the averages. He concluded with moving, that it is expedient that several Acts of the 31st 38d, 46th, and 47th of his late Majesty's reign, relating to the importation and exportation of grain, meal, and flour, be re-pealed, and other regulations provided in lieu thereof, for the united kingdom.

Mr. Calcroft intimated his intention of watching the measure with caution. He thought the present mode of taking the averages was sufficient for all purposes.

Mr. Baring thought the present was not the moment for this Bill, when the agriculturist was labouring under such great distress. He feared that it would tend to create expectations which would not be realized.

Mr. Irving entertained similar opinions.

Mr. Holme Summer thought the Hon. Gent.'s averages would make little difference as to the high or low price of corn. Mr. F. Lewis was of opinion the introduction of Irish corn into the returns, would have the effect of lowering the averages. Mr. Curver, considered some measure was necessary, to prevent the frauds by false returns, and by mixing foreign corn with grain, the produce of the Isle of Man. The consequences of opening the ports at the present moment, which had been shut for four years, would be, that the accumulated corn of the whole North of Europe, which had only this country for a market, would be poured in, and our markets would be clogged, and the avergrees whelly destroyed the affect of which the and the averages wholly destroyed; the effect of which, this country would feel for years to come. On the subject of adequate standard, he thought 80s, was a fair price.

Mr. W. Douglas and Sir E. Knatchbull urged the necessity of practical relief.

Mr. Ricardo observed, that the proposed measure would not give any relief; the best thing that could be done for the farmers would be, to take off the corn laws altogether.

Mr. Lockhart was convinced that some redress should be afforded to the agriculturist.—The Resolution was agreed to. Mr. Bennett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the result of the inquiry into the affairs of Mr. Theodore Hook, and whether the deficit in his accounts with the Isle of Bourbon had been made good.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not precisely answer the question at the present moment. All he knew was, that the result of the inquiry was favourable to Mr. Hook, who was ascertained to be an honourable and meritorious office

On the second reading of the Transportation of Offender: Bill,

Mr. Bennett said, that transportation for orime had ceased to be a punishment. His House was filled with letters, asking for it as a boon. The proportion of females transported, to males, was only one in ten. Government should take these matters into consideration.

Mr. Clive admitted that some improvements might be suggested .- The Bill was read a second time.

The second reading of the Hull Poor Rates Bill was postponed till that day six months.

The Annual Indemnity Bill was passed.

Mr. Martin obtained leave to bring in a Bill to enable persons charged with capital crimes to employ Counsel.

Mr. Lockhart and Mr. Martin objected to the mode pro-posed by the Bill.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY.

Lord Althorpe brought in a Bill to enable Barristers of five years standing to preside over country Courts having jurisdiction of debts under 40s.—Read a first time.

Mr. D. Gilbert moved for leave to bring in a Bill to conse-lidate the Turnpike trusts about the Metropolis, founded on the report of the Committee on the improvement of Turnpike Roads. It was proposed to divide the whole district of London into three districts; one on the south of the Thames, and the two others on the north, denominated the north eastern and north western—each trust would be required to send a certain number of trustees proportioned to the extent of the trust-the Committee appointed to select these trustees would also select competent inspectors, Gentlemen of property residing in the neighbourhood, one able surveyor would also be appointed with several minor survey ors under him.

Mr. Curwen was disposed to look with jealousy on any measure which went to take the trust out of local hands

Sir J. Yorke wished to know if the Bill would touch the trust at Waterloo Bridge

Mr. D. Gilbert replied, that the Bill would not affect any Joint Stock Company.

Mr. Calcraft did not think the Roads about the Metropolis were so bad as represented.—Leave was then given.

Mr. Baring moved for various statements relative to the amount of Silver Coinage from the year 1790 to 1820, with the stock of Silver Bullion.

In the course of some conversation on this motion, the subject of the New Bank Notes was mentioned-in answer to a question as to the failure of the new invention for preventing

Mr. D. Gilbert admitted, that the plan had not been so successful as had been expected, but with some alterations the Directors hoped to be able to pay the Midsummer dividends in the new notes.—The motion was then agreed to.

Mr. Marryatt presented a petition from the collective body of Ship Owners and Traders of the Metropolis, against the renewal of the West India Dock Company's Charter. The petitioners complained of the exactions and exorbitant charges of the company, the rent of 100 tons in their docks for twelve months was 2001, which in any of the ports of the continent would be only 601. The Hon. Gentleman said, the petitioners had not been able to obtain from Government an answer whether they intended to rehew the charter.

Mr. Robinson said, the renewal of the charter was a subject that required consideration, and therefore, Ministers were not to be blamed for not answering the petitioners. Mr. Baring observed, that by the Charter of the Company they were restricted from dividing more than ten per cent. upon their capital, which meant that the rates should never be higher than to allow of such a dividend; their profits had accumulated beyond that ten per cent. till they had amounted to the enormous sum of half a million. It would be illegal to

Mr. Gordon wished to know, if this large sum was to be placed in the bands of Government for the benefit of the public. Mr. Rebinson replied in the negative, as it had got into

Mr. Gordon thought the rates of the Company should be reduced for two years, so as to benefit the Commerce of the

Mr. Irving said, that the excess of 500,0001. (if so large a sum had accumulated,) would be swallowed up by estimates now in their possession. The petition was ordered to be printed .-

WEDNESDAY.

A Bill for providing for the increuse of the Annual Income of the London Institution was brought in and read a first time. A variety of Petitions were presented in favour of and against the Catholic Claims.

Lord Nugent presented the Petition of the Catholics of England, signed by 8000 persons, among whom were seven peers, fourteen barons, seven of their bishops, and a consider able number of Catholic clergy. The Petitioners were ready to swear full and true allegiunce to the King; they did not acknowledge any foreign power, either ecclesiastical or civil, within the realm; they were ready to give any security which might be required. The Noble Lord stated, that only four of the baronies were now in existence whose holders signed Magna Charta, and the representatives of those baronies had signed the Petition.

In answer to a question put on a former night by Major General Wilson, respecting the execution of Murat,

Lord Castlereagh stated, that he had received from Sir W. A'Court confirmation of Murat's having been condemned by his own laws, by a court martial composed of his own officers. The fate of Murat was agreeable to a proclamation found upon him, pronouncing sentence of military execution upon Major Gen. Wilson admitted, that the explanation of the Noble Lord was perfectly satisfactory.

In presenting a Petition from the Roman Catholics of Ireand, Mr. Plunkett passed a warm eulogium on the late Mr. Grattan. The Right Hon. Gent. then brought forward the Catholic question in a very long and eloquent speech, He stated the claims the Petitioners had on the justice and liberality of the House, which, if granted, would be the means of laying the foundation of concord, and it would become the House to consider whether it would not be better to atone for a great injustice which a large portion of the people of the United Empire had long been suffering under, and by that atonement renew the evil. This, he was satisfied, would be best accomplished by going into a Committee to examine into the details of the laws affecting the Catholic aubjects of these realms. He was well aware, that if the House should go into a Committee, he should have nothing to contend with beyond prejudice, and even those who entertained these prejudices still felt a desire to grant the Catholics their claims; but their fears induced an appre-bension of danger to the established religion. In considering the question, he would divide it into three distinct propositions; viz. as it affected the religion of the country, or trenched upon the principles of the constitution, or bore upon the policy of the country. It was due to a Right Rev. Prelate to say, that he had relieved him from all fears on that part of the subject, for he had said that he had no objection to the claims of Catholics being granted on the score of religion—it was, there-fore, only upon political grounds that danger might be appre-In respect then to its bearings upon the state, he considered the state acted as an electrifying power upon religion, and he would ask, why were the Catholics to be selected as the only class to be denounced? Why did they not denounce the mabonetan, the Pagan, and the Jew? A man might worship Jupiter, Osiris, a Croccodile, the host of heaven, or any creeping thing of the earth, but the Catholic was to be excluded from participating in the offices of the Sate, only because they believed constitute of the sate, and because they believed constitute of the sate, and the sate of the lieved something beyond what the Protestant did. They charged with superstition and idolatry on account of the Mass. The Hon. Gent. denied that the belief of the Catholics on this head should subject them to disabilities. They denied their actual belief in the presence of the body of Christ, as was generally supposed they did. The idea of idolatry and supersti-tion, therefore, was idle. He next came to the constitutional question, and here he meant to contend, that an bearing of the admission to all the great offices in the State, was the inherent aumission to all the great offices in the State, was the inherent right of every liege subject of the King. What was to shut them out from this claim? Why, acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope. Now they distinctly disclaimed such acknowlegment. Now if that was to operate against them; up to the time of Henry VIII. there was not a liege subject in the realm, and the nation were outlaws. Magna Charta had been obtained by outlawe—the service of table hed been as been obtained by outlaws—the revolution of 1888 had been accomplished by outlaws. According to this doctrine, there was not a Catholic nation in Europe, whose Monarch ruled over as much as one liege subject. The Honourable Gentleman then went into an historical reference, to prove that the principles of exclusion were contrary to the soundest doctrines of the British constitution, and quoted the opinions of Lord Bacon on the subject in support of his argument. He next came to touch upon what some persons might consider the danger to which the Church might be exposed in granting the Claims; if he (Mr. Plunket) were asked that question, he could not conscientiously say the Church was not in danger in the event of conceding those claims, but the danger lay in the foundation—in the hurmony of the basis; the people were not connected with the State; every safety would be afforded by concession, which rejection might render uncertain; he therefore conjured the House to remove every invidious distinction; he would say, connect the Roman Catholic with the establishment of the State; take away the brand from his forehead and the shackles from his legs, and leave him in the situation the proudest npon earth—that of a loyal English subject. The principal object he had in view was the removal of the oath principal object he had in view was the relation of the oath of denying transubstantiation, and the modification of the oath of supremacy. He concluded with moving, that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House to consider the state of the laws with respect to the filling of offices, so far as the laws affect Roman Catholics, and for considering the expediency of altering or modifying the same.

Mr. D. Browne seconded the motion. l stated his dissent from sor the Right Hon. Gent. for if it was right to admit the Catholic to fill the highest offices in the State, it was equally right that the Dissenter should be admitted to a participation, and it followed as a consequence that the Corporation and Test Acis must be repealed; now, Mr. Pitt had declared these acts the great bulwarks of the constitution, and he objected to the principle of their repeal. Mr. Burke doubted on the subject. The Right Hon. Gent. replied to the arguments adduced from history by the Honourable Mover, and observed, that the ground had been so often trodden that he was ashamed to trouble the House. He might go on, and ask why Quakers (who would not conform to any test) might not as well claim to be admitted to offices, and they were, in all respects, a just, loyal, and charitable class of persons. He was asked what danger would accrue to the present generation by repealing the acts imposing disabilities? To this question he would reply by saying, he was not going to form a constitution for the present day. The Right Hou. Gent said he cherished no hostile sentiments against the Roman Catholies; he had, when in office, conscientionally opposed them, because he thought that the highest official situations should be filled by members of the Reformed Religion. If he thought the measure could be adopted with safety not the united voice of England should make him object to it.

Sir J. Macintosh supported the proposition of his Right Hon. friend, and went into a review of the circumstances attending the different periods of history referred to by the former speakers, in which the question of Catholic disabilities had been agitated and contended that they were impelled to ward oil some temporary danger, nothing of the sort could here be apprehended.

Lord Bury and Mr. D. Browne supported the speaker.

Mr. Dawson opposed the motion,
Mr. C. Grant entered into an examination of the question and supported the motion, calling upon the House to ratify the solemn compact of the union, and cited the admirable terms of Mr. Pitt, when he advocated the Catholic claims, and recommended a wise and liberal policy, by granting the relief now prayed for.

Mr. L. While concurred in the sentiments of the Right Hon. Gent.

Mr. Bankes apposed the motion.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald made some observations with respect to the partiality shown to Orange addresses.

Sir G. Hill opposed the motion.

Lord Castlereagh was at a loss to conceive the construction of that mind which could apprehend danger to the existing institutions from relieving the Roman Catholics from the re strictions of which they now complained. If the political power which they demanded were granted to them, he did not believe they would use it to forward designs hostile to the constitution, or would create, in consequence, any serious nlarm. He for one could not consent to let this question bang on the councils of the Empire; he wanted to relieve the Catholics, with a view to the welfare of the country, for the painful situation in which they stood, which was different from that of all other. dissenters, made them constantly objects of suspicion for which there existed no adequate ground.

THURSDAY.

Mr. H. Sumner moved for certain papers respecting the Orphan's funds. This motion was seconded by Sir W. Curtte. Ordered to be laid on the table.

Petitions complaining of Agricultural distress from Cornwall, luckfield, in Sussex, Northampton, Gloucester, &c. were pre sented.

Dr. Phillimore gave notice of a motion for the 14th inst. to amend the Marriage Act.

The Bill for repealing certain Acts for taking averages of the price of Corn, was read a first time, and ordered for a second reading on the 8th instant. In answer to a question from Mr. Curwen, Mr. Robinson said, it was intended to introduce a clause for preventing fraudulent sales.

A petition was presented by Lord Stanley, from the Merchants, Manufacturers, &c. of Munchester, against the Irish.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that measures bad. een taken to make some satisfactory arrangement in the CASH PAYMENTS .- The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice that he should, in a few days, submit a proposition for enabling the Bank of England, and he hoped, the Bank of Ireland, to resume cash payments at an earlier period than provided for by existing regulations.

Mr. Fitzgerald moved for an Account of the Funds and Re-renues of the Public and Charitable Foundations in Ireland. He stated that a Commission had been appointed some years ago, to inquire on the subject, who had made fourteen Reports, not one of which had been adopted. The suns available for general education, amounted to 174,6251, per annum.

Mr. C. Grant said, many of the suggestions of the Commis-sioners had been carried into effect.— The motion was agreed to. Mr. H. Twiss postponed his motion respecting the Bank-rupt Laws, till the 10th of May. He did not mean to propose any alteration in the general system of these laws.

The Felons Benefit of Counsel Bill was read a first time.—

Second rending on Wednesday.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY.

A Petition was presented from St. Mary, Newington, signed by 1965 Inhabitants, against the Select Vestries' Bill for that Parish. It was laid on the table. The Bill was ordered for a second reading on Monday.

On presenting a Petition, complaining of Agricultural Dates, from certain occupiers of land in Sussex, Lord Millon expressed an opinion that the restoration of Cash Payments would have the effect of restricting the cir-culation of the country, and hence, the farmer could not obtain the same prices for his corn as in former years; reduction of taxes was the only thing that could relieve him.

Mr. Plunkett moved the order of the day for the House to go into a Committee on the Catholic Claims. He proposed six resolutions, (pro forma) on which he meant to frame his. Bill. The substance, in effect, was to require a declaration to be made against the belief of transubstantiation, &c. and the sacrifice of the Mass, as being idolatrous and supersitious, appear to be speculative and dogmatical, not affecting the allegiance or civil duty of the subject, and that the objection taken by the Catholics to the said outh is confined to the word "spiritual" being introduced, it therefore would be expedient to declare the seese in which the word is used, ac-cording to the injunction of Queen Elizabeth, in the first year of her reign, which refers solely to the right of the Kings of this realm to govern according to the degrees committed to their charge by God; they therefore recommend a repeal and explanation of all these points.

After some conversation on the general merits of the mea sure between Mr. Peel, Sir G. Hill, Lord Milton, Mr. Plumbett, &c. it was at length agreed to postpone the resolution to Friday the 10th inst., and leave was given to bring in the Bill. A call of the House for that day was ordered.

In a Committee on the Grampound Disfranchisement Bill, it was proposed by Mr. S. Wortley that the election qualification be 201, per annum.

Lord Milton proposed that Leeds should be a soot and lot Borough. On a division the numbers were—for the amendment 66—against it, 182.

The House afterwards divided on the original question of 201. being the qualification-Ayes, 48-Noes, 94. Adj.

There has been little business transacted during the beginning of the week, the Jobbers being principally emplayed in settling their accounts, as the Account Day was on Wednesday. It was expected that several Defaulters would have been declared, but there was only one on the Settling Day, and it was likely that he would be able, by having a short time allowed him, to make up his differences. Previous to the Settling Day, however, there were two declared, whose differences were pristy considerable. An express was received in town on Friday, which stated the French funds to have risen considerably, in consequence of the rumour that an amicable adjustment was about to take place between Austria and Naples. This had a visible effect on our funds, and the consequence was, a rise of searity 2 per cent. before the close of the market. Yesterday morning the same rumour pervaded the market, which tended to keep up the prices, and at the close of business the prices were as above.

JOHN BULL.

LONDON, MARCH 4.

THE most important political event of the last week, nd a very important one it is, is the resolution of the House of Commons to entertain the consideration of the Catholic claims: we greatly regret these resolutions -we regret them because we look upon them as fallacious, and we should regret them still more if we thought them real: we contemplate with great alarm any interference with the Protestant Establishment in Church and State; not that we are such fools as to have any ridiculous fears about the Pope. We are no more afraid of Popes of the present day imitating the Leos or Gregories, than we are of seeing the Duke of failed, in circumstances of the deepest discredit to all

Gloucester imitate erock-backed Richard: in fact, the Pope's authority is so narrow and precarious, that he is more likely to be engaged in maintaining his own power than in interfering with that of other countries. But what fills us with alarm is the general spirit of innovation, the combined assaults in which we foresee all Dissenters will soon unite against the Establishment.

The Papists are just now put forward, because from a variety of circumstances, a great number of public men are pledged to their support, and because the people of England, who have been artfully taught to look upon it as a mere Irish question, are comparatively indifferent about it; but let Catholic Emancipation be carried, and then, we ask, upon what principle it is, that any distinctive Church Establishment can be maintained? If Papists, the ancient and original enemies of our Church, be admitted to uncontrolled privileges, how can they be refused, in any case, to Protestant Dissenters, who differ from the Church of England in details which are merely dogmatical? And if universal privileges are to be conceded to Dissidents of all persuasions, we should beg to know what is the meaning of the words Church Establish-

Our alarm upon this point is not a little increased by observing the advocates who are foremost in pushing this question. Mr. Plunkett, we believe, is a Dissenter, at least, his father, as we have heard, was a Dissenting minister. Sir James Mackintosh (if he belong to any particular Church) probably is a Presbyterian. Mr. Charles Grant is a Scotchman, and a Scotch Member, and probably is also a Dissenter from the Established Church of England, and, if he be not much belied, carries his religious opinions to an extent of maudlin famaticism which we should think very dangerous in an abler head.

These are the chief advocates of the Catholics, and we own, that such an extraordinary union of the welf and the kid, the lion and the lamb, the Dissenter and the Papist, appears to us extremely ominous.

Mr. Plunkett, Sir James Mackiutosh, and Mr. Grant, are, we believe, men highly respectable in their private character, and, we are glad to think, sincere Christians; but, for the reasons we have stated, we suspect that they may not belong to that peculiar class of Christians politically designated as the Church of England; and when the political rights of that Church are in question, we think we are perfectly justified in declining to accept them as judges between it, and its dissenting

But what do the Papists want? Some of their advocates have told us that they are already in legal possession of every right and privilege; it seems to us that none but an Irish understanding would state this as a reason for giving them something more-more than all is a very Hibernian mode of announcing a proposition: - others of these advocates, more logical, but not more veracious, argue as if the Papists had get nothing; and deep are the groans which they utter for the grievances of this persecuted sect.—Nothing! Is the Army nothing? Is the Navy nothing? Is the Law nothing? Is Medicine nothing? These four great professions are open to all Dissenters, except only that they cannot be judges.

Are all the offices of the revenue departments, Excise, Customs, and Stamps, nothing?

In short, the question comes to this, shall we have a Dissenting King as Head of the Church of England? Shall we have a Dissenting Chancellor to keep the conscience of the Head of our Church? Shall we have Dissenting Privy Councillors to wield his prerogative, and Dissenting Peers and Commoners to advise him in his care of our religious establishment?

For our own parts, as it is necessary to make a stand somewhere, we think we are now on the ground upon which it should be made, and, like our ancestors, who achieved our first liberties, we exclaim,

"LET NOT THE LAWS OF ENGLAND BE CHANGED."

IT will scarcely be believed! It is monstrous, but it is true,—The Queen has taken the Money!!! The Bill of Pecuniary Degradation was scarcely in the House of Commons, when the Queen, by (it is said) Mr. Brougham's advice, sent down a magnanimous rejecting, with scorn, all pecuniary provision as long as her name should be excluded from the Parliament, who, we suppose, knew this great personage's principles, paid no more regard to the message than if it had never been sent; the Bill passed both Houses without objection, (except as to its being too liberal) and on Friday evening, the 23d of Feb. it was solemnly ratified by the royal assent.

What, now, could the magnanimous Queen and her faithful adviser do? The Whig subscription had the parties; the pledge, not to touch the price of deradation, was recent, was positive, was irredeemable: On the one hand stood Honeur, with an empty purse; on the other, Shame, with fifty thousand a year. The principles of the Queen and her advocate did not long hesitate between the two; for, on the said 23d of February, yea, on the very evening, and within a few hours of the Bill's having received the Royal assent, Mr. Brougham (if we are rightly informed) waited upon the Queen, and the result of their conference was, the Queen's resolution to accept the proffered indignity. A resolution which was next day announced at Brookes's by Mr. Creevey-fit herald of such profligate tidings! But Mr. Creevey himself, we are told, expressed the utmost indignation at such unprincipled apostacy. We doubt this; for all England must feel such indignation, and we never knew any one who had any opinions in common with Mr.

The resolution thus announced was, in the higher circles, looked upon for some days as a slander of Creevey's; but in the course of the week the matter was put out of all doubt by an official demand, on the part of the Queen, of the arrears of her annuity. And thus has the Queen, by and with the advice of her Attorney-General, put the seal to the final act of her own degradation.

For our own sakes we beg leave to re-print the terms in which we noticed, on the 18th of February, this pledge of the Queen's:-

" We venture to prophecy that she will, in a very short time, forfeit that pledge, eat her words, take her annuity, and abandon an odious climate, which, as she emphatically says, is as fiehle as its people."-

JOHN BULL, No. 10. We have no doubt but that in a very short time we shall see the whole of the prophecy acomplished.

The Queen has been defeated in the House of Lords. defeated in the House of Commons, defeated in County Meetings; and, at last, defeated in an assembly of her own choosing at a Mansion House Concert.—After such accumulated affronts, she is a great deal more, or a great deal less than woman, if she persists in remaining in a country, the very rabble of which begin to despise

CONCERT IN THE EGYPTIAN HALL.

THE CROWD IN THE EGYPTIAN HALL ACCOUNTED FOR

When Caroline drove to the Concert in state, No crowd to huzza her appeared at the gate :

"How's this, where's my mob?" cried, in anger, the Queen; "Your mob, Ma'am," quoth Wood, " are collected within."

After the preparations of several months and all the active exertions of Wood and his myrmidons, the Queen actually wound herself up to visiting the Mansion House. Her progress to the scene of action, unlike all her other progresses, was private, and instead of going the common and usual road, she went out of her way by the Surrey side of the river and over Southwark Bridge, expressly to avoid the people.

In the carriage with her, besides Lady Anne, sat Lord Hood Cride Evidence on the Delicate Investigation) and -His Lady!-Probably my Lord Head, like another well-known Captain, amused himself during the drive, by singing the popular song of—

"How happy could I be with either, "Were t'other dear charmer away."

With the most marked attention of the Lord Mayor to her Majesty's peculiarities of taste, "wines of the most exquisite kinds" were prepared in a snug room fitted were prepared in a snug room fitted for her reception. This, as it is (thank God) not the "constant custom" of an Englishwoman to drink wine and other liquors, previously to entering a Concert Room, must have been felt and duly appreciated by the illustrious foreigner for whose accommodation it was done.

Having most carefully shunned publicity without doors. as she very wisely did, her Majesty was a good deal puzzled how to secure applause within the building, and with a shrewdness far beyond the immediate comprehension of her suite, she desired that when she entered, God save the King might be played!!!

God save the King was played; and she had the satisfaction of hearing this national anthem (in which no one allusion to a Queen is made directly or indirectly), shouted to the skies, and the vengeance of God invoked on the enemies of the Sovereign she has insulted, and the husband she has injured, by the voices of a host of his loyal subjects, drawn into her presence, either by curiosity, or the more laudable motive which has for ages past collected together the most crowded audiences-Charity.

During all this (to her) heart-rending tribute to our King, she stood smiling and curtseying to give the idea that she was the object of the applause which the song This had its effect on some, and as a ruse, proves that her Majesty's fancy for hoaxing is by no means over.

But, spite of the assumed suavity of those smiles and cheerful looks, what must the result of this evening's entertainment have cost her? After all the puffing, the pressing, the circular letters; after the arduous struggle to make this night the test of the Queen's character, and to make that test marked and decisive, do but let us turn to the list of ladies distinguished by The Times as having been present. And here let us disclaim the alightest imputation upon the respectability of any of them in their own sphere; we merely quote them as persons from an association with whom we are to judge of a QUEEN's pretensions in society.

The Lady Mayoress—(did not go out of her own house.)

Mrs. Tennyson. Mrs. Sykes. Mrs. Ricardo.

Mrs. Martin. Mr. W. Williams and Family-(probably not the family which includes Mrs. Williams.)

Mrs. Wood and-her Daughters.

Mrs. Wilde! and Mrs. Denman—Fee—faw—fum.
And these, gentle reader, with Lady Anne and Lady
Hood, form the whole list distinguished or distinguished, who could be found, with every exertion and entreaty, to meet the Queen on a night which was to prove to the world how she really stood with society; and when they had the noble inducement of charity to others, besides the Queen, to have borne them out.

" Fallen, fallen from her high estate," indeed, is the poor Queen, when only one woman of rank and her paid attendant, could be brought to sanction her on this trying occasion.

Where was the Duchess of Bedford?

Where was Lady Jersey?
Where was Lady Anne Lambton?
Where was Lady Tankerville?

Where was Lady Ossulston? Where was Mrs. Bathurst? Where was Mrs. Damer?

Where was Lady M. Bennett?

Where was Lady Milton ?

Where was Mrs. Bennett?

Where was Lady Rush? Where was Mrs. Taylor?

Where was Mrs. Brougham?

Where was Mrs. Hume? Where was the Duchess of Somerset?

Where was Mrs. Barber Beaumont???
And where was Lady Lindorse????

Not one of them ventured to shew her face in such a cause.

Can any thing now be wanting to show that the bubble has burst, and that reason and truth are regaining their wonted places amongst us. As for the "crowd of joyous faces," of which the Journals speak; it is certain that there was a crowd, and a joyous crowd; they were chiefly of that class of persons who love sights; and whether it were the QUEEN they saw, or that extraor-dinary animal, which Alderman Wood and she pa-tronize, called the BONASSUS, it made no difference whatever to them.

Nothing can mark the universality of feeling about the Queen now in all ranks more strongly than that; even the public female singers flinched from fulfilling their kind intentions toward the charity, because she had thrust herself among the audience. This literally happened on Thursday, and the entertainments of Her Majesty was entrusted to Mr. Broadhurst, from Sadler's Wells, and two

BROUGHAMIANA .- (No. III.)

SATISFACTORY answers to the following questions are requested from Mr. Brougham. He will be aware, that mere contradiction, convenient as it would be, can avail

I. Did you, Mr. Brougham, while yet only taking your chance at the Bar, write to a Member of Parliament, soliciting his interposition with a certain personage, for your nomination to a borough, which you supposed to be under his influence ?- Yes, or no.

II. Did you, Mr. Brougham, promise, in that letter, to be guided in your conduct by your nominator's wishes?

-Yes, or no.

III. Did you, Mr. Brougham, make the house of the hereditary High Sheriff of Westmorland your headquarters, during the elections for that county in 1818 and 1820, wherein you were a candidate? Was your electioneering flag displayed on the battlements of his castle? And, were your voters—your's exclusively, accommodated within its precincts?—Yes, or no.

IV. Did you, Mr. Brougham, at the former of those elections, assemble your voters and mob in the High Sheriff's Park, and there propose to them the formation and plan of an association for the controll of all future elections of that county? Was any permanent badge suggested by you? And did you, on the hustings, advise them to elect no candidate who could not produce to them your recommendation, under your hand and seal?

-Yes, or no.
V. During the poll at Westmorland, did not an account arrive, that a Mr. Brougham had been returned to Parliament for Lord Darlington's rotten borough of Win-chilsea? Were not you, Mr. Brougham, charged on the hustings, with being this rotten Member? And did you not, in reply, solemnly assert, that you were not; that the thing was either altogether a mistake, or, if there was any truth in it, that it was your brother, and not you, who was elected for Winchilsea? And did not you assert all these facts, publicly, and upon your honour, knowing them all to be false?

VI. Allow me now, most pure patriot, to put a question, which does not touch your personal honour like the former, but which a little involves your political principle—Did not Lord Lord Thanet, the High Sheriff of Westmorland, and who was bound, by virtue of his office, to have been neuter in such a contest, pay the expences of your non-election? Did he not, anticipating a defeat at the same moment that you solemnly asserted your expectation of success, take measures for electing you for his close borough of Appleby; but as Appleby was in the Westmoreland, and as such an election would be a confession of despair of getting the County, was it not bargained that Lord Darlington should elect you, my pure patriot, for the borough of Winehilsea, in which you never had been; and that the Earl of Thanet, in return, should elect Mr. Lucius Concannon for his borough of Appleby, in which he never had been; and when the latter election came on, were not my Lord Thanet's own Appleby borough-mongers so disgusted with the traffic, that the gentleman who on the part of Lord Thanet, proposed Mr. Concannon, recommended him in the following extraordinary manner:—

"Gentlemen—I am desired to propose for your election, Mr. Lucius Concannon, but who the devil Mr.

Lucius Concannon is, neither you nor I know or care.

And now, my dainty Brougham, let meask you—YES or No—were you not the mover, the actor, the gainer, in the whole of this dirty traffic? And did it not all take place during a period in which you were stunning the ears of Westmorland, and dazzling the eyes of the rest of England, with the most brilliant encomiums on your own abilities and patriotism?

I tell you, Harry Brougham, that in talents for any good or honourable purpose, you have crewds of superiors; but in capacity for intrigue, and apostacy, and in a power of self-degradation, it has pleased God, for ends, not yet scrutable, to give you unrivalled abilities.

BRSKINEANA .-- (No. I.)

I. VENERABLE and respectable Peer, do you recollect an incident, when you ran away to Gretna Green in the disguise of a lady, to be married to an intimate friend; and when, in order to avoid the pursuit of your family, you drove to Stoney Stratford, where you arrived in the evening, and rested at the principal inn?

A few days before a man had been passing forged notes, and while you and your dolly (now your wife) were at supper, the waiter seeing, with infinite surprise, that the "old gentlewoman" had hessian boots on, made up his mind that you were the utterer of forged notes returned to the charge. The landlord, however, desired the waiter not to trouble his head about it, as he was quite certain that the person at supper was really an old woman; from which reply it is generally supposed that the landlord knew your lordship personally,

Be that as it may, you and your friend escaped; but that some of the party were crazy, it is evident, inasmuch as the saint with whom you were cloping (only think! an Ex-Lord Chancellor of seventy running away with a Fie! fie!) was shortly after immured in Mr. Alexander's quiet receptacle for insane persons.

We cannot see upon what principle of reason or juslice the new-married couple were separated. Will your lordship inform us?

II. Your Lordship is requested to tell us and our readers who Mr. Thomas of Hornsey is; and why the said Mr. Thomas made a precipitate retreat from that

If your Lordship does not answer this JOHN BULL will.

III. What opinion did your Lordship express to Major Charles James, in the lobby of the House of Lords, on the Queen's case? We cannot, from the indecency of your lordship's expressions, repeat it verbatim, but the substance we shall shortly give, unless your lordship favours us with a reply.

IV. Pray, my lord, (and though the subject is delicate, since you are free to broach it in public carriages, we see no harm in putting the question) what did you say in the Brighton couch, a short time since, to three gentlemen, who were passengers, about the Queen? care of your answer, for it relates to your new friend, Sir William Austin, K. S. C.: but, in taking care, take care to answer, and do not suffer these questions to have so melancholy an effect upon you, as those we put in "Broughamiana" have on the Queen's Attorney-General.

TO THE VISCOUNT FOLKSTONE.

My LORD-May I beg to ask your Lordship, whether you did or did not, privately, and without the concurrence of your brother magistrates, add the following line to a county requisition,—" And also of an Address of Congratulation to the Queen?"

I am, my Lord, yours, A MAGISTRATE OF BERKSHIRE.

THE QUEEN'S SUBSCRIPTION.

To the Tune of "The Black Joke."

WHOR'ER knews St. James's, knows where the Whigs met In behalf of the QUERN, a subscription to get, For her Black Wig and her Character white.

By truth and by Wisdom supported she stood-Truth's part play'd by BROUGHAM, that of Wisdom by WOOR-They curs'd, and they swore that she ne'er did amiss, Tho' the Baron, they own'd, was so rude as to kiss The Black Wig with the Character white.

At BROOKES's they met-but demurr'd to the call Of producing the cash-as they had none at all

For the Black Wig and the Character white. COKE grewl'd about rents, swore the funds ought to pay; But Baring grimac'd, and Ricando squeak'd " Nay!" And the young ones exclaim'd, in a querulous tone, They each had to pay for a Soint of their own,

With a Black Wig and a Character white.

But the' the subscription was tardy, and they Had nothing to give, they had plenty to say For the Black Wig and the Character white.

Lord TAVISTOCK stammer'd three world in her praise, And SEFTON his voice and his shoulders did raise; And CALCRAFT his mose cock'd, and GRANT cock'd his eye, And hypocrite BENNET pretended to cry

For the Black Wig and her Character white.

FITZWILLIAM, that reverend proselyte rose-(We'll make him speak verse since he cannot speak prose) For the Black Wig and her Character white.

"You seem," quoth the sage, " all averse to give cash, "And in truth you are right-what is money but trash?

" Let's give something better to end all these quarrels, "And raise a subscription of virtue and morals,

" For the Black Wig and her Character white.

" Besides, 'tis no merit one's surplus to share.

Then let us give that which the least we can spare " To the Black Wig and her Character white.

For me I have changed all my friends at the brunt,

" From Fox, Pitr, and Bunns, down to Connerr and Hunt, " As fickle in age as I was in my youth :

" So I freely subscribe my political truth

"To the Black Wig and her Character white.

Old TIERNEY set down, with a sorrowful face, The hopes of his life, all the prospects of place To the Black Wig and her Character white. The message which BROUGHAM bad advis'd and had penn'd, Poor Tienney had rashly advanced to defend.

And not to subscribe would be rather uncivil, So he gives very frankly -he gives-to the Devil The Black Wig and her Character white.

Such cheap contributions delighted the pack, And, for once, they were ready their lenders to back, For the Black Wig and her Character white. SILLY BILLY, God bless him! subscribed all his sense; Of loyalty GREY made a gallant expence; The Gospels, Lord GROSVENOR flung down in a boast; And ERSKINE gave nobly-hithself, as a toest; For the Black Wig and her Character white.

Bald BEDFORD, his still balder eloquence gave; And BLESSING TON thought that his coup d'ail might save

The Black Wig and her Character white. Big NUGENT bestow'd all his graces upon her, NED ELLICE his credit, and GUILDFORD his hon our; The HEATHCOTES, their sense-both the old and the young-And Home gave—a notice, and LAMBTON gave—tongue For the Black Wig and her Character white.

By FERGUSSON backed, MICHAEL ANGELO TAYLOR Suppos'd that his statesman-like views might avail her Black Wig and her Character white.

CHARLES CALVERT and HURST their gentility join; And GRENPELL was ready, his visage to coin; And CREEVRY, of other donations bereft, Subscribed all the courage that WARRENDER left, To the Black Wig and her Character white.

Grave FOLKSTONE, who once before leaped in the dark. Transfers his devotions from Mary Ann Clarke

To the Black Wig and ber Charocter white. And WETHERELL and TENNYSON, sol-disant Lawyers, Would give her their fees-if they had but employers, SCARLETT offers his law and his wit too, - for SCARLETT Chimes in -- as he pleasantly tell us-with Harlot In a Black Wig and a Character white.

But some with whom nominal morals ran low, Contriv'd other modes their devotion to show,

To the Black Wig and her Character white. BURDETT gave the bond he recovered from Scott-And WILSON the thanks in the field he had got-And LEINSTER a visiting card of his rib's-And Foley a draft upon- Howard and GIBBS! For the Black Wig and her Character white.

But as to the rest it were tedious to sing, How they sacrificed love of their Country and King, To the Black Wig and her Character white... Such talents, such virtues, how much they surpass BARING's stock, GRENFELL's copper, or Lushington's brass! Endow'd with such treasures, who would not dispense With the paltry account of pounds, shillings and pence,

For the Black Wig and her Character white. But when the great Lady was told of the kind

Of efforts the Whigs made for raising the wind For her Black Wig and her Character white. She rose in a fury, and roar'd out, "God zounds! " Run, VIZARD, secure me Lord LIVERPOOL's pounds: " Of the virtues of Whigs I have more than my share, And their talents and truth are not worth half a linir " Of my Black Wig and my Character white."

I, for one, should certainly, the first morning I heard her name mentioned from the reading desk, instantly quit my pew with my family, and should not attend church in future till after the litany was read; and I have no doubt but hundreds more would act in the same manner. Ought not then the feelings of the church frequenters to be a little considered, as well as those that are not so, and whom the Honourable Gentleman seems so desirous of conciliating?—I am, Mr. Editor, your constant reader,

TO JOHN BULL.

SIR,—It it be true, as reported in the public newspapers, that Mr. Lambton, on presenting a Petition from Barnard Castle, in the County of Dutham, praying that the Queen's name might be restored to the Liturgy, said that it was signed by 169 inhabitants out of a population of 200, and that "the tax-gatherers were the only persons who refused to sign it," I beg to vitiate Mr. Lambton's assertions by the following statement:—

The population of Barnard Castle, Mr. Lambton said, was From which I think it but reasonable to make the following deductions:-Parish Paupers, say Women Children under 14 years of age "Tax gatherers" Leaving only this number who had any business. to sign the Petition

To what hamlet, parish, town, city, county, kingdom, or quarter of the world the remaining 54 bona fide men belong (to make up Mr. Lambton's complement) I will not presume to conjecture, as I feel quite certain that I could not make any guess that would come to any thing like the truth.

Mr. Lambton talks of "tax-gatherers" as though they were snug placemen and pensioners. Now, the fact is, they are not appointed by Government, but by the inhabitants at large of townships and parishes, at public vestry-meetings. It is an office that is never sought after; indeed so very "unthankful" is it generally considered, that most men endeavour to evade it; and those who are forced to fill it, perform its duties reluctantly. It is, therefore, the very perfection of ignorance and folly to say, that "tax-gatherers are the "tools of Government." Such gratuitous falsehoods can only be made with one and that obvious to all those who are not unhappily blinded by Radical principles.

Mr. Lambtou made similar observations to the above, on presenting a petition from Yarm, in Yorkshire. 'It is not, however, to set him right that I have thought it necessary to address you; but for the important cause of truth. As Mr. Lambton's motto tells us, "le jour riendra," when the utterers of such falsehoods will have to answer for them!

Your early insertion of this Letter in the columns of your loyal Paper, whose infancy is marked with sound constitutional principles, will much oblige your constant reader. FITZ-LOYALTY.

York, Feb. 26, 1821.

TO JOHN BULL.

SIR,-Amongst other traits of constitutional virtue exhibited by the Whigs in their character of itinerant orators, their respect for the established church has been most forcibly delineated.

The clergy have unhappily incurred their resentment and indignation, having been guilty of the unprincipled act of expressing from one end of the kingdom to the other, the warmest sentiments of loyalty to the throne and attachment to the constitution. As a punishment due to such enormities they have been vilified and abused by the mild and dispassionate Earl Grey, and received merited reprobation from the sneers and sarcasms of Lord Holland. The underlings have felt it their duty to follow their political leaders with equal virulence, but with more frankness of language, and more explicit avowal of intention.

We have an happy illustration of this in a speech delivered at Durham, by silly Mr. Lambton, in which he says, "Whilst the people of Portugal and Italy are pursuing the same glorious object—whilst they are asserting their rights, establishing their liberty, renovating their constitution, and wisely appropriating the enormous revenues of the church to the uses of the state, what are we about in England !!!"

Here then the clergy have an open enemy; simple language, the meaning of which cannot be mis taken by the greatest booby on earth. It appears, indeed, that even the dull braîn of that hopeful Eléve of Mr. Coke's school of Itadical Whiggism, the Viscount Anson, fully comprehended it. In anticipation of this glorious consummation to be expected from a Whig administration, a most happy expedient presented itself to this patriotic lordling. It is asserted on authority quite indisputable that his Lordship determined to dispose of his advousons in Norfolk and elsewhere!!

Now this, though a well-known and well authenticated fact, brings us into a difficult dilemma. Are we most called upon to condole with the church on the loss of so noble a patron, of to sympathize with his Lordship's feelings and tender him the assurance of the high admiration we entertain for the principles that actuals his great and generous mind. The risible faculties of our nature, in spite of all the restraint we can put upon them, incline us most irresistibly to the former alternative.

A FRIEND OF JOHN BULL.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS, Feb. 24.—Yesterday, a soldier was apprehended in the Bois du Boulogne, who had uttered the most seditious lan-guage, accompanied with horrid imprecations against the Duke of Angouleme. This circumstance gave rise to a report, that the man had some design against his Royal Highness, who usually rides in that direction; but the drunken state of the man and the publicity of his conduct, render that improbable. He has, however been detained.

A private letter, received from Paris, on Thursday, says, that the Neapolitun Parliament has resolved to make a Decia-that the Neapolitun Parliament has resolved to make a Declarration of War against Austria only. Nothing is said in it respecting France, Russia, or Prussia.

Paris Papers arrived yesterday.—The Austrian army continues to advance against Naples. The first column, commanded by General Stutterheim, has passed through Florence. The second column, commanded by the Prince De Weid, arrived in that city on the night of the 12th. The Prince de Labender and Parra William has passed through the prince de Labender and Parra William has passed through the prince de Labender and Parra William has princed in the prince de Labender and Parra William has presented in the prince de Labender and Parra William has princed in the prince de labender and princed in the prince de labender and princed in the prince Hohenlohe and Baron Villatte have commands under the Prince. General Frimont had his head-quarters at Florence on the 13th. It is stated, under the head of Vienna, that the Austrian columns murch with such rapidity, the van would probably pass Rome about the 18th, and the light troops were expected to enter the Neapolitan territory before the 23d.

ROME, Nov. 11 .- Austrian troops have entered Bologna .-Our Government are taking the measures which circumstances require. The garrison of the Castle of St. Angelo has been singularly re-inforced. We are not without uneasiness for our frontier on the Neapolitan side. At this moment, we are assured, that a strong detachment of Neapolitan troops, which had collected at Foggin, is in march for our city. It is re-ported that the Prince Regent has quitted Naples, with the gar-rison of that city, for the Abruzzes. His Royal Highness is said to have issued a Proclamation to the army, announcing that war was determined upon.

A Proclamation has been put forth by his Holiness the Pope, dated from the Quirinal, Feb. 7, enjoining his subjects to pay respect to the Austrian army passing through his States; to consider them as friends, and not to oppose them in their passage. A contrary line of proceeding will be marked with the most circumspect vigilance, and visited with the severest rigour of the law.

The Austrian Declaration of War against Naples has been published. It begins with a history of the Carbonari, whom it charges with a design of overturning all the Italian Governments; in 1816 the vigilance of the Royal Government on its restoration, succeeded in baffling the endeavours of this dangerous seet, until 1820, when the events in Spain gave them gerous seet, until 1820, when the events in Sprine gave them new energy, and by the contagious influence of fanatical doctrines, it increased its power so much, that the laws and police were unable to check it, and a part of the military were seduced in consequence. In this state of things, the Austrian Monarch interfered, to preserve not only Naples, but other. States in Europe. The King of Naples was invited to Laybach, to confer with the Allied Sovereigns. When the King came to Laybach, he found it in vain to ground a proposal on a condition absolutely rejected by the Allied Sovereigns, who would not suffer the continuance of the present onler of things at Naples, and that, if the Parliament was not dissolved, arms at Naples, and that, if the Parliament was not dissolved, arm must be had recourse to. It then states the determination of crossing the Po, and says, that the Emperor of Russia, if necessary, will join his forces to those of Austria. But they have no object but the safety of all States, and the peace of the world.

It was yesterday reported that the Neapolitan troops had reached Rome before the Austriaus, and that the Pope had It was added that the Parliament of Naples bad removed from that city, and an expectation was entertained that the example of Moscow would be followed on the approach of the Imperial army to the capital.

A Document has been published by the King of Naples, addressed to the Prince Regent of Portugal, from Laybach, in which, after professing every wish to promote the happiness of his subjects, states, that he had taken a long journey—that after an interview he had no longer any doubts as to the judgment formed by the Allied Powers in respect of the events at Nuples; that flading their determination irrevocable not to recognize the present situation of affairs of Naples, but to attack the nation by force of arms, that they, desirous of preserving the interests of the Neapolitan people, propose that he should establish a system of government calculated arguarantee for ever the repose and prosperity of the kingdom, He therefore desires the Prince Regent to give every publicity to this document, until he can arrive to perfect the system

An article from Augsburgh, dated the 28th of February, reduces the amount of the Austrian army now advancing against Naples to 50,000 men, a reserve, however, of the same number is said to be in readiness.

FLORENCE, Feb. 13.—The advance guard of an Amstrian column entered this capital on the evening of the 11th. This day they marched for Sienna. Five or six other columns are expected here. They write from Naples, that the whole English squadron had sailed for Messina, and that, when it could be collected in that harbour, a great change might be expected in the affairs of Sicily.

TURIN, Feb. 16.—According to letters from Naples, Spanish officers frequently arrive there singly, as do ex-officers of the ci-devanturmy of Italy, and many partizans from the Ionian

A political revolution has broken out at Madeira. According to the accounts received from thence, it appears that on the 28th of January, five of the leading inhabitants entered the eastle and demanded an interview with the Governor-General, which was granted them, they stated that it was the wish of the whole of the inhabitants for a Constitution similar to that at Lisbon. This demand seems to have met the concurrence of the military, the result was the desired constitution was immediately proclaimed, the greatest public rejoicings followed the event which lasted three days.

I.AW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY, FEB. 27. Strathmore v. Strathmore.

The plaintiff in this case is son of the late Earl of Strath-more, by Mary Millner, now Countess of Strathmore, and was born in the year 1811, but the Earl, his father, was not married to the said Mary Millner till the 2d of July, 1820, and died on the next day. According to the law of Scotland, by the marriage of his parents, the plaintiff was legitimated, and con-sequently he claims the title and dignity of Earl of Strathmore.

The defendant, the brother of the late Earl, the Hen. Tho-mas Bowes, pleaded in bar, that the plaintiff is not Earl of Strathmore, and that his parents, at the time of his birth, were unmarried, and resided, and were domiciled in England, and that the plaintiff, being illegitimate, is incapable in law, of inberiting the dignities.

After the case had been heard at some length, the Lord Chancellor suggested that, as a petition had been presented from one of the parties to the House of Lords, it would be advisable to let a Committee of Privileges determine the question of title before proceedings were further carried on in this Court.— Both parties have consented to adopt this suggestion.

THURSDAY, MARCH 1.

Elliston and others v. Glossop, Jones, and Others.

Mr. Hart this day resumed his Motion for an Injunction to restrain the defendants, the proprietors of the Cobourg Theatre, from representing, printing, or publishing the Melo-Drama of Therese, which the plaintiffs alleged to be their property.

Mr. Agar contended, that the works were not copies, and that there were not six sentences alike in the whole of the book. After considerable argument, Mr. Elliston asserted that he and the other plaintiffs had not gone one lots from the original affidavit, and declared, that as the Manager of a National and Patent Theatre, he would insist that the defendants should not perform his piece. He did not complain of the other Theatres, but what be complained of was, that the defendants had pirated his work, and he now called on the Court to protect him.

The Lord Chancellor, after going at some length into the merits of the case, and laying down the practice as to the jurisdiction of the Court, directed that the passages in the French book, which had been left out in the English ones, should be pointed out to him, and that those passages which had been added should also be shown; as also those passages in the prompter's book, which are not represented on the stage. Till this was done his Lordship could not have the real matter of fact before him, which it was highly impostant he should have, and therefore he could not finally dispose of it.

EARTHQUAKE.—A letter from Zante, dated Jan. 3, communicates the following particulars of an earthquake in that island;—"The last week has been a scene of horror and destruction at Zante. About four o'clock in the morning of the 29th of Dec. we had a violent shock of an earthquake, which lasted nearly half a minute; this was followed by eight other shocks, between four and six o'clock, which threw down one thousand three hundred houses. Providentially, the first shock did not throw down many, so that the inhabitants had time to escape before the succeeding shocks, otherwise the loss would have been dreadful. Only ten lives have been lost, but not a house in the town has escaped without some injury. The town is still in a complete state of confusion; one thousand five hundred houses more being so much injured as to be marked in order to be pulled down. The streets are almost impassable from the fallen houses; and great caution is required in walking to avoid the ruins that are still falling. My house has also, suffered greatly; but, thank God! none of the walls have fallen, though they are much cracked: part of the roof fell in and broke about 401. worth of glass, amongst which were a number of bottles of beer, wine, &c."

still continues to prevail, indeed, it may be called an universal fashion, the effect of a fine head of bair strikes every beholder with admiration, and has always been a favorite theme for the artist's pencil, and the poet's muse, and of all modern inven-tions for displaying it in the most fascinating manner, Atkinson's Curling Fluid has long stood pre-eminent, by applying it after curling the hair, it counteracts the harshness which hot irons produce, makes it soft and glossy as silk, and keeps the curl firm during exercise in dancing or walking, or in damp wea-ther. It also removes the dandriffe, prevents the hair falling off or turning grey, and is perhaps the greatest regenerator of hair in the whole areana of nature. It is sold by most respectable Perfumers, but as there are some very near imita-tions, the following signature is on the label of the genuine.

Advertisement.—Among the changes which have taken place in commerce of late years, perhaps there is none more remarkable than in the East India Company's trade with Bengal; formerly Muslins were among the chief and most profitable articles of their import, whereas, from the great loss acurred by the very low prices they now bring at their sales. they have decided to stop their importations, and orders have already gone out to lay down the factories; so that, when the stock at present in their warehouses is sold, there will be an end of this trade. The superiority of these muslins arises principally from the spinning and bleaching; the former not being the operation of machinery, but of the delicate fingers of the Hindoo women, and the latter being merely the natural effect of light and heat in that tropical climate.

Monthly Agricultural Report for February. season, now nearly passed, has proved most propitious in all respects to the cultivation of the soil, and comfortable and healthful to live stock. The operations of husbandry throughout the last and present month, ploughing, harrowing, rolling whents, preparing the barley fallows, and bean setting, have proceeded almost uninterruptedly. The wheats and winter crops in general cover the ground sufficiently, and have a most promising appearance. The turnip crop has succeeded in most parts beyond expectation, and in many, was more abundant and chean in the latter than in the early season. In short, the country is full of all kinds of product for the support and luxury of man, and even full of money, or its valid representative, for every species of useful projection.

Mr. Scorr.—We lament to say, that the gentleman of the name of Scott, whe was wounded in a duel at Chalk Farm, on Friday se'unight, died on Tuesday night last.

An Inquest was held, on Thursday Evening, at 5 o'Clock, at Chalk Farm, before Mr. T. Sterling, the Coroner, to enquire into the cause of his death; when the substance of the evidence was as follows: A Carpenter, named Smith, employed at Chalk Farm, stated, that he assisted in conveying Mr. Scott on a shutter to the Tavern, after he was wounded. He knew nothing of the duel; all that he could say was, that he saw four or five gentlemen standing near Mr. Scott, who, on being placed on sbutter, shook hands with the gentleman who had shot him, and wished him good night.

The Ostler of Chalk Farm stated, that two gentlemen called at the Tavern, and had two glasses of negus and a bottle of wine a short time before the duel; these he suspected to be Mr. Christie and his friend, and followed them a short distance; on his return he met two gentlemen who enquired after the other two, and shortly after heard the report of a pistol, and then a second shot was fired. Application was made for assistance, and he accompanied the curpenter, Smith, and found Mr. Scott lying on the ground on his back, covered with a coat and a military cloak; the parties were then about forty yards distance, conversing. This witness described the feelings of Mr. Christie as acute, and his expressing his regret that he was not in the situation of Mr. Scott.

Dr. George Darling attended Mr. Scott frequently, and attributes his death to the wound which he received. Witness referred to a memorandum which he made of what Mr. Scott said to him. Mr. Scott, referring to his wound on Saturday morning between nine and ten o'clock, said, "This ought not to have taken place; I suspect some great mismanagement—there was no occasion for a second fire." After a short pause he proceeded,—"All I required from Mr. Christie was a declation that he meant no reflection on my character. This he re-fused and the meeting became inevitable. On the field Mr. Christie behaved well; and when all was ready for the first fire, he called out—'Scott, you must not stand there, I see your head above the horizon; you give me an advantage.' I believe he could have hit me then if he liked. After the pistols were reloaded, and every thing was ready for a second fire, Mr. Trail todaed, and every thing was ready for a second fire, Mr. Trail called out—'Now, Mr. Christie, take your aim, and do not throw away your advantage as you did last time.' I called out immediately, 'What! did not Mr. Christie fire at me?' I was answered by Mr. Pattmore, 'You must not speak; 'tis now of no use to talk; you have bothing now for it but firing.' The signal was immediately given, we fired, and I fell." Does not know Mr. Christie or Mr. Trail's christian name. Deceased any series of himself estisfied with Mr. Christie conduct whom expressed himself satisfied with Mr. Christie's conduct, whom he described as very kind to him after he was wounded.—The Coroner at one o'clock adjourned till the following day On Friday the evidence was resumed.

Mr. Pettigrew, a surgeon, was examined, he attended pro-fessionally at the request of Mr. Patmore, and when Mr. Scott was wounded, rendered the necessary assistance.

Witness being asked if he did not hear it said on the ground by Mr. Christie, that he had fired down the field, replied, I did to the best of my recollection.—Mr. Christie said, "Why was I permitted to fire a second time, I discharged my pistol down the field before; I could do no more." These expressions were made in consequence of some altercation which took place between the seconds. Mr. Patmore stated to witness some days after the occurrence, that if Mr. Christie and his friend had agreed that he should not return Mr. Scott's fire, Mr. Christie's friend was bound, after the fire, to have communicated to him the conduct pursued by Mr. Christie, of which he, Mr. Patt-more, was entirely ignorant.

Wm. Beville Maurice, pupil to Mr. Pettigrew, confirmed part of the latter's statement

A Bow-street Patrole said, that he received information of the duel: On his arrival at the Farm, he was told that all the parties save two had escaped, they were not given into his custody.—Mr. Watson was called in to contradict this statement, he gave Mr. Patmore into the custody of the officer, but he since had escaped.—The Jury condemned the officer for not having acted with more activity in apprehending the parties.—Two postillions were examined, and merely proved that they drove the parties to the ground.

This concluded the evidence, and the Coroner recapitulated the testimony of the whole of the witness

The Jury adjourned to an adjacent apartment, and after deliberåting about half an hour, delivered their Verdict.—'' Wilful Murder against Mr. Christie, Mr. Trail, and Mr. Patmore.''

The Coroner issued his warrant for their apprehension. We cannot quit this subject without paying a just tribute to the generous spirit and high feeling evinced throughout the whole affair, by Mr. Christle, who is, we understand, a gentleman of the mildest manners and most amfable disposition.

POLICE.

Bow-Street.-One of those sdepts in the science of astre-Bow-Street.—One of those steps in the science of astro-logy, rulgarly 'yelept a conjuror, named Charles Blake, was charged with carrying on his art at his lodgings, No. 73, New Compton-street. The officer who apprehended him produced a trunk full of mystical wands made of hollow tulip wood with curiously inlaid handles, magic boxes of all sizes, with very curious handles, wax dolls, playing cards, so cut and contrived as to answer various purposes, magic pictures, a choice collection of portraits, male and females, either serving for lovers for girls and boys, with a quantity of printed hand-bills informing bachelors and maids that by long study, he had acquired the art of shewing any lady or gentleman the "very meral" of the person she or he was "doomed to marry."

A fat country boy, a bachelor, fifteen years old, gave evidence against the Wizard and stated, that he had paid him two shillings last Sunday afternoon for a sight of his intended, a very comely slender lass.

Hearing of his fame, and with intent to catch the learned man, the officer or trap took a lady, to whom the Seer shewed a youth with long bill or nose, the cut of which did not please the lady; Restrudames, however, said, " pleased or not she must be content with his worship's nose, for the Fates had so decreed." On which her companion the trap took him into custody. The Seer then exclaimed, "Oh dear! What a fool I must have been not to have seen this!"

Mr. Blake said he was born in the land of Seers, was a native of Montrose, bred a cabinet-maker, had studied necromancy under Mr. Moon, at Birmingham, and was constantly surrounded by stars, that he first set up for himself at Nottingham; but, "bless his stars, he there found it all moonshine—so came to Torden."

The Mugistrate told him he was a fit subject for prison, and thither the conjuror was led.

Wednesday George Holson, an ill-favoured youth of 18, was brought up, charged by his wife, aged only 17, with beating her in a very brutal manner.

The young wife appeared with a dreadful black eye and swollen face, and her head tied up. She had an infant of three months old in her arms, and seemed herself in a very delicate state of health.

Her father in describing the treatment which the complainant had received, said with much emotion, "I have had dreadful cause, your Worship, to make me careful of the safety of Minton.—"Yes. Sir, I am the father of Mary Minton, who was murdered by William Haitch some time ago, and he afterwards cut his thront in Newgate."

The Magistrate said he felt very much for Mr. Minton, and observed that it was a great misfortune that persons were suffered to marry so young.

Minton said they were married clandestinely.

After a good deal of conversation the defendant was ordered to find bail, and Mrs. Holson was taken home by her father.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

Boomin.-A man named James Matthews, has been committed to our gaol charged by a person named Prior, with the murder of one James his (Matthews's) brother-in-law, sixteen years since at Crown Dale Mine, near Tavistock. According to Prior's statement, the deceased Matthews and himself were employed in the mine, which was about twenty-two fathoms in depth, James laid the match to the train for blasting the mine, and called to his companions to draw him up, they wound him up a short way, when Matthews insisted upon letting go the windlass, Prior, as he says, refused, when Matthews struck him on the left arm with a pick hilt, which forced him to quit his hold, and James was precipitated to the bottom, his schill fractured, and he died in two days.

Saturday se'nnight, at three o'clock, Matthew Osborne, for the murder of his wife, was executed in front of Newgate. A coffin was placed behind him on the plutform. His body was afserwards dissected...

FURNISS.—On Menday week, an inquest was held before the Coroner, at Moor, in Torver, on the bedy of John Jones, dancing-master. The deceased and William Massicks had a quarrel on Saturday night, between twelve and one o'clock, when the decessed shopped Massicks on the face twice, and a fight ensued. Massicks's father interfered, but the deceased knocking the younger Massicks down, he begged of the deceased to be with the Massicks down, he begged to the deceased the control of the state of the control of the state of the ceased to be quiet, and said he (Massicks) would submit, and infinediately left the house. The elder Massicks and Jones then had a scuffle, during which the candle was knocked out, and they both fell on the floor; upon which the younger Massicks. sicks came very quickly into the house, through a back passage, and joined in the fray, and with a knife, or some sharp instrument, inflicted sixteen different wounds upon the decensed. He died between two and three o'clook on the aftermon of Sunday, and the Jury returned a verdict of ful Murder" against the younger Massicks, and against the elder for aiding and assisting in the murder.

MOLT.—Some miscreants, it is supposed, in a spirit of revenge towards Mr. Crowe, of Bale, placed some corresive sublimate in some dough, which was strewed amongst the barley menl and cut hay in the bins; two of his beasts were found dead in the yard on the morning of Saturday; the throats of two others were obliged to be cut, another died on Monday morning, and two others are in a doubtful state.

LEIGESTER.—A man named Humphrey, who had been, with his brother in-law, to a gentleman's house at Atherstone, was found, on Monday morning, murdered, a short distance from the Barrow Inn, near Hinckley. When found, he had nothing on but his shirt. His bull-boots were traced to the posses sion of a soldier on furlough, at Hinckley.

LEEDS.—We learn, from a very interesting document, just published, showing the cotton twist and manufactured cottons sent from Hull yearly, from 1814 to the present time, that the quantity of twist exported has increased from seven to seven-teen infillious of lbs,; and that of cotton goods, from nine millions to near fifty millions of yards! the quantity of the latter being half as much more in 1820 than in any other year! We trust this is a proof, that on the Continent our trade is yet likely to be predominant. LEITH.—A family, consisting of four persons, a man and wife, and their son and daughter, who resided in Lawson's Wynd, foot of Sheriff Brae, were observed by the neighbours to be later than usual in opening their door, on Friday the 23d; it was broken open, and discovered that all, except the old woman, were lifeless; and she in a very weak state. The melanchely catastrophe is supposed to have arisen from Smoke, and the windows and doors being closely shut up.

Buchelor of Arts.— Geo. Heneage Walker Heneage, Student of Christ Church.

SHEFFIELD.—It is with heartfelt satisfaction that we obtain, from various sources of information, the gratifying intelligence of the improvement which has taken place in the manufacturing affairs of this town; and, though the increased demand for cutlery, kandware, &c. may not be equal to the additional one that is made for articles of a less durable quality, yet we have reason to think that the amount of goods manufactured in this place has not been exceeded at any TBISWORTH,-An Inquest was taken lately on the body of Mr. Viret, steward to the late Lord Charles Spencer. He had gone out to shoot a rubbit, with a double-barrelled gun, for a sick child, accompanied by two spaniels, when his gun burst and killed him. He was a most shocking spectacle; his fnithful dogs, when he was found, were watching over the body.-Verdice, Accidental Death.

DOMY.—Verdict, Accusement Duath.

TIPPERARY.—A shocking instance of depravity occurred here on Thursday se'nnight. As two boys, named Dwyer and Drawley, were playing, some alteroation ensued. Drawley snatched a turnip from the other, on which Dwyer plunged a shoemaker's cotting-knife into the heart of the poor boy. Drawley had strength to crawl home, when he exclaimed—"Oh, mother! he has killed me;" and instantly expired— Dwyer, who is fourteen years old, was ledged in goal.

deceased was only twelve.
Your,—A new line of mail communication is about to be established from this city to Liverpool; the mail to leave here at 9 o'clock every night, and to pass through Wetherby, Harewood, Otley, Shipton, Gishurz, Calne, Barnley, Blackburn, Preston, and Ormskirk.

WINCHESTER.—A public dinner and a ball are to be given to his Grace the Duke of Wellington, in this city, on Monday next, and we have no doubt that the gentlemen of the county will be anxious to avail themselves of this opportunity of testifying their respect for a passes who has rendered such enament and splendid services to his country.

A destructive fire took place on Monday evening last, in the laboratory of Messrs. Butlers, wholesale chemists, in Gutter-lane, occasioned by the porter carrying a lighted candle to some curpenters, which set some spirits on fire, and the whole place was in flames. The premises were consumed, and the houses of Mr. Gardner, a trimming manufacturer, and Messrs. Jackson and Co. engravers, were greatly damaged, as well as the backs of six houses in Cheapside.

URLING'S LACE (of the real Point and Brussels fabric), 147, Strand, near Somerset House, removed from 392, Strand.—G. F. URLING and CO. beg. be inform the Fashbonable World, that they have prepared for the Season a various and extensive Assortaness of their PATENT LACE DRESSES, from three Guineas to an emailerd Guineas each; some of which, from recent improvements, they humbly presume to compare with the most perfect foreign productions. Also a great variety of Veils, Soorfs, Squares, Laces, Nets, &c. of every description. This peculiarly clear and transparent Article having, is the ingelies, superseded the use of common Lace, which the becomes rough and fell of fibre on the first washing, the Patentees respectfully apprise the Public, that the latter is frequently starched to conceal its defects, and make it resemble Urling's Lace, which, therefore, can only be relied upon as genuine at their Wholesale and Retail Establishment in Eondon, or of the Country Dealers supplied by them. Every Article is distinguished by a Seal, with the Patentee's Initials, "G. F. U. and Co." and the wards, "by if a (late) Queen's authority." Specimens, shewing the superiority of Urling's Lace over common Lace, may be seen in Ackermann's Repository, La Belle Assemblee, and other fashion shle works, and may be had gratis, by application, post-paid, to G. F. Urling and Co.

Country Dealers supplied upon the most liberal terms.—Manessetery, Basford, Nettinghamskire.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

It is understood that the Parliament of Nanle has declared Sicily independent, and that the Sicilian Deputies to the Neapolitan Parliament are setting off for Palermo to form one in that island.

A letter received in this capital from Naples, on Friday even-ing, states, that his Royal Highness the Prince Regent has sent ing, states that his royal righness the Frince regent has sent to the Junta of Sicily a proposition to make choice between the Neapolitan Constitution and any other that the Government may think more suitable to that island. The same dispatches announce to the Sicilians, that the Prince Regent recalls the 11,000 Neapolitan troops which are in Sicily. the departure of the letter, the Neapolitan squadron was under weigh to proceed thither, to embark the said troops.

March 5 .- We have just received a private letter from Nuples, dated the 15th ult. which supplies the following

To-day, at the breaking up of a long sitting, in which the report of the Committee, nominated the preceding evening to examine the Ultimatum of the Powers, was read; the Prince Regent left the Hall at the head of the Members of the Parliament, and pronounced before the assembled multitude the form of a declaration of war against Austria and the conlesced Powers. The troops have received orders to march. General Carascosa has taken the supreme command. Beguni has en-treached himself in Gaeta. The Neapolitan troops appear to have a design of marching against France.—(Gazette de

NAPLES, Feb. 20. —A correspondence has been published which took place on the 10th ult. between Sir W. A Court our Minister at Naples, and Chevalier Pignatelli, the Commandant in that City, on the subject of the British naval force in the Bay of Naples, in which our Minister distinctly states, that the British Senden is manufactured to the provide British Squadron is merely one of observation, and to provide in case of necessity for the security of the persons and pro-perty of British subjects; that the British Government is de-termined to preserve a strict neutrality, and to take no part either directly or indirectly in the war which appears to be approaching. The Parliament have authorized a forced loan aporoaching. of three millions of ducaus to be levied upon trade, industry, and funded property. General Pepe has resigned the chief command of the Neapolitan army, which has been conferred on General Filangieri.

The Parliament have declared their dissent to the propositions communicated from the Allied Sovereign, tending to the overthrow of the Constitution; the Duke of Calabria, Regent of the kingdom, according to the decree of the 10th December, 1820, having declared that it never will make peace with an 1820, having declared that it never will make peace with an ensury while occupying its territory.

The Duke De Gallo has made a report to the Congress, of the journey which he made, from which it appears, that he was placed under the charge of the Police, and only allowed one short interview with his Sovereign. He also states the conduct of the Sovereigns, that Austria, Prussia and Russia, may be considered hostile to the order of things in Naples, that the French plenipotentiaries by a note have adhered to the instructions given to the Ministers of the other powers, but have not engaged to take any active part in the war. He culogizes the conduct of Great Britain in remaining neuter.

Private letters from Rome supply the following details:

the evening of the 13th of February, some persons entered the city, and announced that a great number of Neapolitans were advancing. This intelligence caused alarm, and the town guard was called out. On the following morning Cardinal Geosaly and out reconnections caused alarm. salvi sent out reconneitring couriers, who, on the stated, that they had not seen any Neapolitan troops. It was finally found, that the arrival of some Neapolitan desertors, in the environs of Rome, and given rise to the false report.

These letters say, that the Austrians have taken possession of Ancona, to support their corps de reserve.

Every body at Naples was occupied with the tragical death of Gianpietro, formerly Prefect of Police under Joachim. He received several wounds with a dagger; in a ratired place; and the murderers, after killing him, put in his mouth a paper, marked No. 1. He was killed on the occasion of an entertainment which he gave to celebrate the Deciaration of the Congress of Laybach; but reports vary much on the particulars of this event. Search is making for the assassims.

VIERWA, Feb. 16.—The Austrian columns march with such rapidity, that the van-guard will file off under the walls of Rome on the 18th. The first light troops will be in the Neapelitan territory on the 23d. His Holiness the Pope having expressed a wish that the capital might be exempt from the passage of the troops, even the officers have been forbidden to enter it without special permission from the General-in-Chief.

Madraid, Feb. 23.—It appears by letters from Cadiz, that the squadron of the ships of war, which it is thought is destined for Naples, will be composed of a ship of the line and two brigantines. We have already announced the departure from Cadis of the Pearl frigate, which is bound to Carthagena, there to join two ships of the line, and then to proceed together to Naples, "where (says the Constitutionel), perhaps, their pre-sence will not be valueless to the friends and defenders of the liberty of that State.'

CORUNNA, Feb. 10 .- Yesterday afternoon, at four o'clock a drunken man called out "Long live the King, and perish the Constitution;" be was immediately arrested, but not till he had received some severe blows from the persons who board his seditious cries. This occurrence caused many persons to assemble, who demanded the punishment of all the delinquents.

Order was maintained without difficulty during the night. At twelve e'clock to-day, people began running about the streets, the doors of the houses were shut, and several persons appeared armed with pistols and sabras, demanding the heads of the prisoners brought from Orense, who were confined in the Castle; but this commotion was kept down by the appearance of the troops and the exertions of the Magistrates. In the afternoon fresh groups assembled in like manner. The General appeared at the balcony, and addressed them; he afterwards went down into the source lead to the source lead. went down into the square, and assured them that the law would punish delinquents. He took all the necessary precau-tions, sent out patrols, &c. and all was soon made quiet.

CADIZ, Feb. 16. An event has occurred here to-day, which would be incredible if we did not know what excesses the sanguinary enemies of our institutions are capable of. The boys in one of the public schools were repeating this morning the Catechism of the Constitution: among the persons present was a man of respectable appearance, who saked the master which of the boys was best acquainted with the Constitution? The master made no difficulty in pointing him out, on which the man praising his application, asked permission to take him to a confectioner's to treat him with some cakes. The master agreed, and the man took away the poor boy, not to the confectioner's but into the field, where he best him in a cruel manner, leaving him weltering in his blood, and nearly dying.

In this state he was found by some women, who carried him to BOLOGNA, Feb. 20.—Travellers, who quitted Naples about four days ago, inform us, that it was vaguely reported in Naples, that a Russian squadron was truversing the Dardanelles to take its station in the Mediterranean.

PALERMO, Feb. 4.—The Government has dispatched moveable divisions into the interior of our island, to levy contributions by force. Disorder is at its height; the thieves and britions by force. Disorder is at its neight; the threes and my gunds march in bands, and scour the great roads. The town of Contessa, containing about 5000 inhabitants, was recently compelled to make resistance, during a whole night, against one of these bands, whose design was to pillage it.

PADUA, Feb. 9.—The General-in-Chief, Baron de Frimont PADUA, Feb. 9.—The General-in-Chief, Baron de Frimont, published on the 6th instant a second Order of the Day, which states, that from the day on which the army shall pass the frontiers, the Emperor grants to all individuals who compose it the same advantages which were enjoyed by the troops of the corps of the occupation in France.

Stockholm.—The English traveller, M. de Brooke, who last summer arrived at Stockholm with the intention of prohis travels beyond the Polar Circle, has returned here safe after his ardnous undertaking. Proceeding first to Drontheim, he pursued his way along the coasts of Norlander and Finmarker, until he reached the Northern Cape, and waiting there until the fall of the snow, he in the middle of winter traversed the Deserts of Lapland with rein deer, until he again reached Sweden. During part of this singular journey, the cold is described to have been intense:

We received American Papers to the 11th ult. In the coarse of yesterday. A Bill has passed the House of Representatives for reducing the army nearly one balf in number, and to lower the expences of the military establishment one half in amount. The Committee of Ways and Means have reported that the future revenue of the United States will meet the expenditure.

By the arrival of the Marquis of Salisbury Packet, with the Leeward Island Mail, we have received advices from Saint Thomas's to the 20th Jan. ### LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY, MARCH 8.

The National Union Insurance Company v. Bigmeld, Esq.
Mr. Hart was this day heard at some length, on a motion praying his Lordship to dissolve an injunction which had been obtained to restrain the Defendant from interfering with the concerns of the Company. The principal ground on which the Learned Counsel founded his orgument was, that the Directors had, by the original deed executed on the formation of the Company, the power of redressing any grievance they might have to complain of relative to their efficers or servants, and that there was no occasion for going into this expensive application to the Company. cation to the Court.

After hearing Mr. Fonblanque and Mr. Shadwell at some length in support of the Injunction,

The Lord Chancellor, after some general observations, postponed the giving finel judgment until he had weighed all the circumstances connected with the case, and on which he had not observed.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, MARCH 6. Sleat and Co. v. Fagg.

The plaintiffs are bankers, residing at Christchurch, and had employed the firm of Rogers, Olding, and Boycott, as their agents in London, to pay off their notes, and to remit them to Christchurch, to be there re-issued. The defendant is one of the proprietors of the Poole mail-coach, and of the Southampton night-coach. On the 1st day of December, 1819, a parcel of notes was sent by the house of Rogers and Co. to the defendant's coach-office, and there booked. The parcel contained 1,3001. of the plaintiff's notes, and was directed to Mr. Angier, who was clerk in the bank of the plaintiffs, at Christchurch. The parcel never reached its destination, and this action was brought to recover the amount.

Mr. William Boycott proved, that on the following day, notes to the amount of 8601. was presented to the witness for pay-ment, and another lot of 1001. in the afternoon of the same day, which he also paid; but it being unusual to have so large a sum presented for payment on the same day, witness's suspicions were excited, and, on examination, he found that the other clerks had paid 5901. more. The whole amounted to 10591, and were some of the very notes sent off the preceding that the helpfundate of the property of day to the defendant's office. On examining the defendant's books and way-bills, it was found the parcel had been sent by the Southampton right coach, not by the mail, as described in the undertaken, and it was marked "missing" in the way-bill.— The porter proved, that he delivered the parcel at defendant's office, paid two pence for booking it, and received a memorandum. He neither insured the parcel, nor informed the defendant of its contents.

The defence consisted of two points; first, it was contended, that the notice in the defendant's office should have protected that the plaintiff's agents had not acted fairly in not making known to the defendant the contents of the parcel, and insuring it accordingly.

Witnesses were called to prove, that the usual notice posted up at the coach-offices, which was produced in Court, had been known to Rogers and Co. It was also proved, that the parcel was sent by the Southampton coach, but was stolen on the way. The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.— Damages 1,050l.

Rumer v. Reece.

This was an action for Libel, brought by the plaintiff, the proprietor of the Cardiac Tineture, against the defendant, in sonsequence of some strictures which appeared in the Gazette of Health (of which the defendant, Dr. Reece, is editor,) upon the composition of that medicine.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY.

On the second reading of the Newington Vestry Bill, Mr. Denises opposed the motion on the ground, that the Bill would be injurious to the parish by removing out of the hands of the twelve Gentlemen appointed by the parish the government of its affairs, in order to place that government in a Select Vestry—besides the petition in favour of the Bill was signed only by 106 inhabitants, while that against it was signed by 1,965. He moved that it be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. Sargeant Outlier supported the Bill, which he com

Mr. Sergeans Outsiew supported the Bill, which is contended, was framed for the purpose of governing the parish in a more orderly and better manner; the Vestries having for some time past been conducted in a disorderly and tunultuous manner.

Sir W. De Crespigny, Dr. Lushington, Major-General Wilson, Mr. Williams, Mr. Monck, &c. opposed the Bill, while Mr. Price, Mr. H. Sumner, &c. were for going into a Committee on it.

The House divided.—For the second reading, 128—Again it, 82—Majority, 46. The Bill was then read a second time.

Mr. S. Wortley neved the order of the day on the report of the Bill (or disfranchising the Borough of Grampound, Lord J. Russell who brought it in having abandoned it in consequence of the amendment proposed by him, (Mr. W.'s) being carried. The Hon. Gentleman under these circumstances proposed, that the vote should be extended to housekeepers paying scot and lot on an amual rent of 201, for house and land.

Some conversation arose between Mr. Abercrombie, Mr. Lockhart, Mr. Hobhouse, Mr. Courtenay, Mr. Hume, dr. and the Bill was ordered to be recommitted on the quest going into a Committee on the Husbandry Horses Bill.

Mr. Curwen intimated his intention of opposing the Speaker's leaving the chair, until do instruction was moved for repealing leaving the chair, until an instruction was moved for repeating all the Horse Duty Acts imposed on Husbandry Horses, a tax which was very oppressive on the Agricultural interests, and went to discourage the breeding of horses. He suggested that to compensate for the abandonment of the tax, an additional duty might be laid on Game Certificates, and a tax upon Russia tallow. He then moved an instruction to the Com-mittee to provide means for repeating the duties on Agriculturnl Hor

Sir C. Burrell seconded the motion. He conceived the tax to be one on the very implements of Husbandry; as well might the Plough be taxed, or any implement. The Hos. Baronet suggested the propriety of imposing a tax upon Bank transfers. He admitted there would be a great cry about the measure; but the tax would be so small as scarcely to be felt. Mr. Lockhart urged upon Ministers the necessity of alle-viating the general distress.

Mr. Grenfell could not reconcile the idea of a tax upon transfers upon Stock, which would if acted upon by the House, be a breach of public faith.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that it was not easy to part with a tax of nearly half a million in sent state of the country. He did not mean to say, that a substitute could not be found.

After some observations from Mr. Huskisson, Col. Davies, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Lushington, &c. &c. The House divided.—For the motion, 65.—Against it, 122.—The House then went through the Committee.

Mr. Curwen moved for an account of all transfers of Stock made in the last ten years, excepting in respect of purchases made by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, distinguishing each kind of Stock. The Hon. Member admitted, that the ultimate object of his motion was a direct taxation upon funded property. He thought it was but fair that property should pay for protection.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought the object of the Hon, Gent. was an unjust one. The Stockholder, in fact, did take his share of the public burthens; distress and ruin v be the consequence of such a proposition—what he would ask would become of the widow and orphan whose sole dependence was upon the funds?

The motion was negatived.

Dr. Lushington moved a string of resolutions in respect to the ceturn of Mr. Ellis, a Member for the City of Dublin, in effect, declaring that such return was incompatible with his duties as Master is Chancery in Ireland—the office requiring a constant residence in that part of the United Empire—on these resolutions, he meant to found an Address to the King, praying History, he was a superior of the Honor of the H Majesty to remove Mr. Ellis from his said office majesty to remove mr. Ellis from his said omce. The non. Gent. contended one or other of the duties must be neglected. it would be no answer on a call of the House to say, that Mr Ellis was attending his duties in Ireland, and these according to the oath which he took on entering effice required ten months of his attention, for they could not be performed by deputy. Mr. E. was appointed to the office in 1806, having purchased it for 9,0001.; the salary as settled when a revision of offices took place was 4,0001.; per annum. Dr. L. referred to two cases to shew that the duties of the office and those of Parliament were incompatible. In 1549, a Sergeam at Law, was taken into custody by order of the House, for going the circuit without leave, and in 1602, a Mr. Culliford suffered similar duresse for going to Ireland to fulfil his duties as Commissiones without leave. After some further observations he submitted his resolution.

Mr. Lennard seconded the motion.

Mr. Ellis complained that he had not been treated with much delicacy by the Learned Doctor. In the present question the House would be aware, that private right formed an ingredient in the consideration. With respect to the necessity of his attendance in the Court of Chancery, it was there that he bad admitted before the Commissioners of Enquiry, that the daties of the office required ten months regular attendance in the year, and that he was always in his office. The business of the Court of Chancery in Ireland proceeded in rotation before the Musters—a Muster's name was selected, and then it was a matter of indifference who did the duty. When an order of reference was made the Solicitor took it to a Master, who if not there, then he took it to another as a matter of course. When he quitted Ireland on the 17th of last month, not a cause remained. From the 1st of January to the last day of December, the Master's Office was not shut for a day. In the busy time of the year he took the business for two months, the other Masters then did his business, and he in return attended during the vacation. If he found that the office required more time than he could devote, he should resign. The Hon. Member having stated these facts, withdrew.

Mr. Peet maintained, that the Hon. Gent. had done his duty, and instanced cases of individuals with the Army serving in th Peninsuls, and Members of this House, had never been charged with neglecting their duty—the same with Ambassadors. He objected to the motion as founded upon unjust principles.

Mr. Abercrombie supported the motion.

Mr. Brownlow opposed it.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the question had been before the House on a former day, and the House came to a deci-sion that the proposition should not affect the present situation of any individual. He objected to the present motion on another ground, that it would operate as an expost facto law:

The House divided.—For the motion, 52—Against it, 112. Adiournad.

TUESDAY. Mr. Curwen gave notice that he would, on the 15th instant.

A vast number of petitions were presented, from Chester, Berkshire, Sussex, and other counties, complaining of agricul-

A petition was presented from the Trustees of the London Water-works against the Bill for repealing part of the Act of Charles the Second, prohibiting buildings in certain parts of the banks of the Thames; it was laid on the table.—A petition was also presented from certain merchants, traders, &c. of the City of London, to the same effect.

Major-General Wilson asked whether a letter which he had een in the papers from Sir W. A'Court, our Minister at Naples, to the Duke de Gallo, was sanctioned by Ministers. This letter seemed to indicate, that, under certain circumstances, England would join the confederacy against Naples.

Lord Castleresph said, if the Hon Officer shewed sufficient grounds for producing any Papers on the subject, then, if the House sanctioned the motion, it would be his duty to produce

Mr. Maberly rose to submit a motion for repealing taxes to a certain amount, with a view to relieve the country from the pressure under which it suffers. He had made provision to spect the diminished income which would accrue thereby, and that would be economy. He then proceeded to shew, that taxes to the amount of 2,060,9001. might be reduced; and he proposed to render the Unfunded Debt available to the exigen-cies of the State. He then entered into a comparison of the state of the country in 1792 and 1820. When Mr. Pitt brought in his Budget, it contained no charges arising out of the preceding war; that of 1820 was similar. He then stated the different heads of expenditure, the charges on the Consolidated Fund, the annual votes of Parliament, (Ways and Means), and the inroads made on the Sinking Fund. On the former, up to the 5th January, 1821, the whole charge was 46,120,5171. The Ways and Means, 19,313,3001. and various other items, which be enumerated, the result of which left a surplus of 3,861,0971, applicable to the liquidation of the National Debt. He noticed the expences incollecting the Revenue. In England, the Customs collection cost 13 per cent.; in Ireland, 23 per cent. averaging 141.10s.9d. in the 1001. for the united kingdom. In 1792, the Customs cost but 41.9s. 6d. in England, or the average for both countries about 51. 11s. He thought that a saving might have been made last year, of 3,000,0001. in the collection of the Revenue. He adverted to the Report of the Com-mittee of Finance in 1817, which gave in an estimate of the probable expences of the country for 1820, which they stated, would be 17,350,0001. but the actual estimates were 19,313,0001. being an excess over the Report of 1,963,0001. The Government, considering the distressed state of the country, ought to have kept under the estimated Report, and not have so gr exceeded it. Having dilated upon these points at some length, he concluded with submitting three resolutions, to the following effect :- " That the Finance Committee of 1817, having estimated the expenditure for 1820 at 17,350,000l. and the sums actually voted, having exceeded that estimate by 1,960,0001. it is expedient that the supplies for the present year shall not exceed the estimate of 1817; that to the amount of the difference between that sum and the estimates to be proposed for 1821, certain taxes shall be repealed; and that a reduction of 50 per cent. be made in consequence upon the duties on inhabited houses and windows, the reduction to comfrom the 5th of January, 1822.

The Chancellor of the Exchaguer replied to the statements and calculations of the Hon. Gent. With respect to his comparison between 1792 and 1820, it must be recollected, that the estimates of the former year were the lowest that ever had been submitted since the American War. Still, however, there was no disproportion between the two periods. The Hon. Gentleman had talked of repening the duties on certain articles of taxation; he ought first of all to have attended to the practicability of repealing them. He had in fact begun at the wrong end of the work. The annual votes would soon be called for, and then motions like the present could be more properly made. When the estimates for the year were laid on the table, it would be found that reductions to the amount of one million had been made. He condemned the selection of the house and window tax for repeal, even if such could be made, the country was not in a situation to dispense with a tax amounting to 3,200,000l. In the collection of the revenue, reductions had been made in the customs to the amount of 130,000i. and further measures were in progress for extending them. Ministers were disposed to administer the Government with the strictest economy; but no doubt let them economize office at a less rate than their predecessors, and to bid for it as at a public auction. Mr. Hunt, Mr. Carlile, and such persons, were ready possibly to accept office upon terms less than Gentlemen opposite were disposed as do. He could not think it safe to venture at present upon any further reduction, as pro-posed by the Hon. Gent. With these views he should move the previous question...

Mr. Calcraft maintained that a reduction in the public expenditure must be resorted to

Mr. Huskisson conjended, that we were not at liberty to take off taxes, unless we preserved the Sinking Fund.

Mr. Ricardo thought the Sinking Fund a delusion altogether.

The present question was one simply of economy.

Mr. Lushington had no doubt if a practicable saving was pointed out. Ministers would adopt it; but the present one would not relieve the agriculturist.

Mr. Ellice supported the motion.

Mr. J. Smith supported the two first resolutions.

Mr. Wilmot opposed the motion. The House then divided—
For the resolutions, 83—Against it, 109- Majority, 26.

A Bill for consolidating the Act relative to the building of Penitentiary Houses and Gaols in England, was read a first Ordered to be read a second time this day fortnight.

The Nova Scotia Trade, and the New South Wales Duty Bills were passed.

Mr. Lennard gave notice, that he would, on the 1st of May, move to repeal the Seditious Meetings and Blasphemous Libel Acts.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY.

Mr. James presented a petition from N. Broadhurst, a prisoner in Lancaster Castle, sentenced to two years' imprisonment for Sedition, stating various complaints against the gaoler, among the rest that he was confined for 17 hours in a day out of the twenty-four to a cold damp room; his letters opened; that on another occasion he was sent to a place of degradation called the ditch, and fetters put on him. The only grounds for this treatment was, that the same Magistrates acted who had distinguished themselves at Manchester on the 16th of August.

Mr. Hornby and Lord Stanley denied the latter part of this statement. The regulations of the prison had received the sanction of the Magistrates, and were approved by that learned, humane, and constitutional Judge (Bailey). As to opening the Letters, such a practice was necessary to prevent improper intercourse dangerous to the safety of the prison.

After some conversation, the House divided.—For receiving the Petition, 33—Againt it 86.

The Catholic Emancipation Bill was read a first time. Second reading on the 16th inst. 5.

The Orphan's Rund Committee was postponed till this day fortnight.

Mr. Lambton stated his determination to bring on the question of Parliamentary Reform on the 10th of April.

Mr. Hobbesse presented a Petition, signed by from 1,000 to 1.500 inhabitants of Westmiaster, complaining of the conduct of Judge Best, in having and Davidson. He denied that the Judges ought to have the power of fining.

Some conversation ensued as to the reception of the Petition, which had been objected to on the ground, that the conduct of the learned Judge and received the sanction of the Court of King's Bench. The Petition was at length withdrawn.

of King's Bench. The Petition was at length withdrawn.

Mr. Gooch moved for the appointment of a select Committee to enquire into the Distress of the Agricultural Interests. The Petitions on the subject, he observed, were signed by 100,000 persons, the yeomanry of the country. A heavier curse, he observed, could not follow them to refuse the prayer of these observed, could not follow than to reduce the prayer of these petitioners. It was not against internal produce that the agriculturist wanted protection, but against foreign; no great relief could be extended while the present system of Corn Laws continued to exist. The warehousing was one great defect. He observed that the property seturned by agriculturists was 6,473,4751.; the amount by trade was only 2,000,0001.; the proportion which the land bore to the other branches of the revenue was as three to one.

Sir E. Knatchbull seconded the motion.

Sir E. Knatchbuit seconded the motion.

Mr. F. Robinson was disposed to agree to the motion for a Select Committee. He had no wish to restrain the enquiries of that Committee from financial objects. He did not object to taxation being one of the subjects of enquiry; in making the enquiry, he hoped the Committee would consider how farthis part of the subject might affect public credit, and whether, the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether, and the subject might affect public credit, and whether and the subject might affect public credit, and whether and the subject might affect public credit and whether and the subject might affect public credit if savings were to be made, the amount or these savings ought not to be applied to the reduction of the debt, than to an immediate diminution of taxes. He was afraid that the Agricultural Interest could not expect much relief from that source. He trusted they would take a judicious, comprehensive, and statesman-like view of the subject. High protecting duties seemed to be the object of the petitioners. He had already said that he could not assent to the proposition, and this applied to various articles of import, which touched, would reduce the revenue 600,0001., a sum raised from articles generally supposed to pay no tax at all.

Mr. Curven was not inclined to augur favourably of the result of the enquiry after what had transpired. He had no result of the enquiry after what had transpired. He had no wish to exclude the foreign grower from the Home Market: on the contrury, he desired to place him on a level with the English grower; nor did he wish to repeal any of the taxes to pay the debt, but he denied that some of the burden should be removed to prevent the complete and irremediable ruin of the nation. The agriculturist now paid 261 per cent.; one great evil, therefore, was enormous taxation. He strongly recommended economy, as one means of remedying the general distress.

Mr. Tremayns recommended economy.

Mr. Wodehouse conceived every class of the community required relief.

Mr. G. Bennett contended, that the Committee should consider the general state of taxation, and the state of the currency, or the enquiry would be a mere delusion.

Mr. Western was of opinion that it was not by the money price of bread that the agriculturists were affected. He did not anticipate much benefit from the Inbours of the Committee.

Mr. D. Browne and Mr. Barham were friendly to economy. Mr. Ricardo agreed with the Hon. Gent. (Mr. Western) that it was not t.e money price of corn, but the labour prices which came under discussion, and on this account he was a friend to a free trade in corn. He thought the low price of corn was occusioned by too great a supply, not the consequence

After some ebservations from Mr. Davenport, Mr. Calcraft, General Gascoyne, and Mr. T. Wilson, the Committee was formed, consisting of Mr. Gooch, Lord Castlereagh, Mr. F. Robinson, Mr. Brougham, Mr. H. Sumner, Mr. Western, Mr. Huskisson, Mr. S. Wortley, Mr. Wodehouse, Lord Althorpe, Mr. T. Wilson, Mr. N. Calvert, Mr. Ricardo, Mr. Curwen, Mr. G. Bennett, &c. &c.—Adjourned. THURSDAY.

The Speaker counted the House at four o'Clock, there being only thirty-five members present, the House adjourned

FRIDAY.

Mr. Byng brought in a Bill to establish a Company for the better lighting of the Metropolis with Gas.

Mr. S. Wertley complained of a breach of privilege in a publication of the 26th of February, in the Morning Chronicle Newspaper, in the following passage:—"List of the Minority of 37 who voted on Friday last, the 28d, for the hearing the petition of Thomas Davison read before it was rejected; and against Lord Castlereagh's admenition to the people of Eng-land not to trouble, and take up the time of the House of Commons any more with their petitions." He contended, that this announcement tended to influence the votes of the House, and was a foul calumny upon the Majority, and he called upon the House to assert its privileges and preserve the freedom of debate. He then moved that J. Lambert, the printer of the said Paper, be brought to the bar of the House on Monday next. Sir G. F. Hill seconded the motion.

This motion led to a long discussion, in which it was insisted on by Hen. Members who supported the motion, that the publishing of Majorities and Minorities, as well as the publication of Debates being an infringement of one of the Standing Orders of the House, though not objected to-the complaint in the present instance was, that the printer had stated, that a question was advocated by one side and opposed by another, when in fact, such question never came before the House. The Noble Lord had never made such a statement as therein imputed to him.

Mr. C. Long, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Huskisson, Mr. C. Bathurst,

&c. supported the motion.

Lord Cartiereagh said the paragraph had been pointed out to him, and it was said he ought to complain of it to the House, as it was, perhaps, as falso, detestable, and wicked a libel as ever appeared on the House of Commons. As a Minister of the Crown, the task of complaining to the House would look rather invidious, the extreme absurdity and contemptible character of the paragraph, would render it innoxious even to the ennest capacity. It was contended on the other side, that the Noble Lord b made use of admonitory words in respect of the subject's right of petitioning, (which the Noble Lord distinctly denied), and that the paragraph was not a libel, but a mere statement of what had really taken place. Mr. Busnett, Mr. Barbara, Sir C. Monck, Loni A. Hamilton, Mr. Creevey, Sir R. Ferguson, supported this opinion. Mr. Bennett moved an adjournment. On this a division ensued—For adjourning, $4—Against if, 155.

Mr. S. Wortley refused to withdraw the motion, unless the Gentlemen on the other side would admit that it was a bre of privilege. After some opposition to this suggestion, Dr. Lushington admitted the fact, and then the motion for calling the Printer to the Bar was withdrawn.

A petition was presented from Charles Hill, confined in Ilchester Gaol for the last fifteen months, for a deficiency in his accounts as Collector of the Assessed Taxes—that deficiency, originally 6171. he had nearly liquidated, and there now remained about 701. due, The Petitioner was stated to be 74 years old. He prayed the merciful consideration of the House. After some discussion, the petition was laid on the Table.

On the question for going into a Committee of Supply, Mr. Creevey objected to the Speakers leaving the Chair. He complained that the House, constituted as it was, could not do justice to the country; and instanced the patronage possessed by Members of that House in appointing to 140 places of great profit, namely, 70 distributors of stamps, and 70 collectors of land tax. It was impossible for gentlemen to shut their eyes to the fact, that numerous pensions and sincures were possessed. by Members of that House, and that all the great annuities and patronage of the country flowed from the House of Commons; the patronage in fact, was so great, that the House of Com-mons had become much too strong for the people. He moved an amendment, calling upon the House to take this subject into immediate consideration, previous to granting any supplies.—The House divided on the amendment—Ayes, 38—

The Speaker again put the question for going into the Com-

Mr. Hums then salled the attention of the House to the Military Establishment of the country. He contended, that the amount of force to be kept up should be regulated by the data of 1792; the number in that year was 48,475; we now had twice the number of irregular force; he complained of the great and increased exposee in the Guards—troops which could not be sent to relieve the Colenies. The charge for the Life Guards was 93,0001. a year; a saving might be made in that part of the Establishment: he tho the Staff the expense attending the War Office, might be reduced to the standard of 1792. The ninety-three regiments might, in his standard of 1792. The ninety-three regiments might, as his opinion, he reduced to seventy-five, each to contain two battalions of one thousand men each; a saving to the country would accrue thereby of 212,000l;; he thought that 150,000 men were sufficient for all purposes of defence. He contrasted, at some length, the various establishments for 1792 to the present time, and moved accordingly.

The Amendment was negatived.

After some conversation, it was agreed to postpone the Army Estimates till Monday, on account of the lateness of the hour—(12 o'Clock),

JOHN BULL.

LONDON, MARCH 11.

THERR is one vice with which the Queen never was charged—we mean Hypocrisy—that exception must now cease; the Queen has written a Letter, the Chronicle says to Lord Liverpool, the Courier says to the King, but no matter to which, in which she accepts with every expression of humility and duty, the fifty thousand a year, stating that she does so " in consideration of the gracious manner in which his Majesty was pleased to recommend her interests in his speech; and humbly referring the question of the Liturgy to his Majesty's future and most gracious pleasure.'

We should be as much surprised to see figs growing on a briar, as to see sentiments of duty, propriety, or modesty in the Queen; for what purpose she thinks fit now to assume these qualities we cannot guess: but we can tell her that the result will be to disgust the Public ten times more than her violent, undutiful, and seditious conduct has hitherto done.

She has been so long in the habit of thinking that painting her face improves her personal appearance, that she perhaps thinks it possible to paint her character so as to make it tolerable to the public eye; but she is mistaken—the person and the character will still be but painted sepulchres, in which the beauty and the virtues which gave grace to her earlier days are buried. never to rise; and we confess we are less disgusted with the bold audacity of her original Letter to the King, than we are with the report which we hear of this last whining and hypccritical apology.

Perhaps, some simple Wader may ask us, whether he would shut for ever the door to repentance, and whether even in such a heart remorse is not possible it is unnecessary for us to answer that question, for the Queen has answered it herself: she founds her retractation on the "gracious mention of her in the King's Speech;" and this is no more or less than a downright and deliberate falsehood, as the following reasons will convince every impartial reader-

First. The mention of her in the Speech is any thing but gracious, it is what she deserved it should be, dry and contumelious.

Secondly. It was after the said Speech that Lord Archibald Hamilton, the brother of her hired servant. supported by her hired Law Officers, and acting on her behalf, endeavoured to force her name into the Liturgy

Thirdly. It was after the said Speech, that her Attorney-General, Mr. Brougham, brought down afficially, that notice (impudently called a message) in which she indignantly rejected the provision which she now so humbly accepts.

Several other reasons will occur to every one who has watched the course of events; but these three are so clear, so simple, and so decisive, as to the falsehood of the new pretence, that we think it unnecessary to add a syllable more, except to entreat our readers to keep their eyes fixed on this new manœuvre, and to be on their guard against what the character and principles of the Queen convince us is but a new device of mischief.

Whenever we see Old Father Thames change his course, and flow back again from Westminster to Henley bridge, we shall believe that the Queen is returning to a due souse of her domestic duties, her private honour, and her public station.

WE perceive that there is a shew of getting up Petitions against further concessions to the Roman Catholics. Petitions have been so prestituted in behalf of Colonel Wardle, Mrs. Clarke, and the Queen, that Petitions have been so prestituted in behalf we regret that the friends of our Constitutional Esta-blishments should think of dabbling in such dirty waters. There is no subject whatsoever on which we could not engage to get Petitions of equal numerical amount on the opposite sides; may we believe that it would not be hard to prove, that the populace, who must always be the majority, have been enlisted on the wrong side of every question that has ever been agitated.

Ten Irish coal-heavers will fill up more space at the tail of a Petition than Sir William Scott; and accordingly we see, that in all ages and all times, the sacred right of Petitioning has been treated with due dis-

There is but one thing to be done, constitutionally and effectively, on the subject of the Catholic Claims; it is, that every sincere and honest Protestant Elector should lay down his local and personal prejudices and partialities, and declare that he will not, at the ensuing elections, vote for any man who has voted for the Catholies.

We are against all pledges from candidates; we think them dangerous and unconstitutional; but we think it is both safe and legal to pass our opinions on those who have been our representatives; to judge of them by what they have done, and to say to them, "You had a full unfettered right to vote for the Catholics, but we have a right, as full and unfettered, to vote against Such, at least, is the course we should venture to recommend, and if it be fairly and generally adopted, we have no doubt that it will operate on the minds of honourable Members,—not in making them alter their own opinions, God forbid! but in forcing the weak, the wavering, and the time-serving, who make it a habit to stay away on ticklish questions, to come down and do their duty.

BROUGHAMIANA .- (No. IV.)

Personal deformity ought not to be a subject of political ridicule, but when Brougham called upon the House of Lords to remember the face, and particularly the nose, of Cucchi, the waiter at Trieste, it is but fair to recal the bon-mot of the late Lord Ellenborough, upon the droll hitches and twitches in Harry's nose, which, he said, seemed to have their origin in a consti-ousness of its destiny.-A correspondent has turned the thought into poetry, which we subjoin:

"Pray remember, my Lords! Pray remember the nose!

"Which Cucchi, the waiter, had on"—
Said the great Mr. Brougham, as he drew to a close, And made the impression, which every one knows; Said the Lords—"Pray remember your own!".
"I perfectly guess," said the Westmoreland chief,

"What your Lordships are willing to say:
"But mine is a mase, which requires no relief; "For, suspictous of danger, it shifts like a thief,

"Instinctively out of the way."

There is a story told, and pretty well authenticated, of Broughant's reply to some person who remarked to him, that he should not allow the Queen to patronize the Times, as it did more harm than good to her cause—" I cannot interfere about the Times," said the Attorney-General; "I have enough to do to keep her from the Courier.

We have our doubts about this fact; we know the spirit of his reply was as is here reported; but we are inclined to think he did not repeat the joke about the Courier. Make it we know he did not-it was originally said in a more piquant way by Lord Norbury.

There is another story told of Brougham and Wood; the former went to visit the Queen on business. Wood refused to admit him, and tried to shuffle him off with divers and sundry excuses: at last, Brougham insisted upon being admitted: "I must see her," said Brougham.
—" If you must—you must," said the Alderman—" but rely upon it she cannot see you!"

We suspect this anecdote, because we think Wood is too great a fool to make so pointed a reply; but as to the fact alluded to, it is not to be doubted; and is, indeed, only a corroboration of Brougham's own declaration-" that it was useless to endeavour to get any information from the Queen after dinner."

We readily insert the following article, although we have not seen or heard of the book to which it alludes:-TO JOHN BULL.

Ser,—As I have every reason to believe that however severe you may be, you are not unjust, I take the liberty of requesting a place in your popular Paper for the following review of a Pamphlet just published.

I am, Sir, Yours, &c. SYLVANUS.

Wood-street, March 6, 1821.

Remarks on the Life and Character of Matthew Wood Esq. Alderman, Fishmonger, and M. P. p. p. 69, price 2s. 6d.

It appears that the author of this scurrilous work has entirely failed in his aim, and by the substitution of personal rancorous abuse, for just and fair discussion of character, marred the cause of which he appears to be (however humble) the supporter. We shall not take up much time in prefatory remarks, but proceed to analyze some of the many assertions and falsehoods which the anonymous writer throws out.

At page 5, line 18, he says-

"The stubborn obstinacy, as well as downright stupidity of this blockhead," (meaning Alderman Wood) "is notorious, and fidly justifies Mr. Broughau in his remark that 'except the identical animal which chews the thistle, a greater ass does not draw the breath of life.'"

Now, this is not discussion—there is no reasoning in all this-no argument-calling a man an ass is no difficult task, and if it come simply to a matter of abuse, the author might with equal justice call Peter Moore a block-head; Sir Gerard Noel a lunatic; or the Rev. Mr. Fellowes an unbeliever: and we must observe that we think (if impossibilities were made possible) that Mr. Brougham ought to blush at having suffered an expression so unworthy his general character for mildness and gentle-manly feeling to have escaped him.

We have little hesitation in saying, that, we consider the calling a man an ass, in the present state of society, a gross personality; and it is for the inconsiderate adoption of this style of calling names, that we are constrained to quarrel with our author in the outset of his publication.

At page 6, he says-"Wood is descended from obscure parents."

This is surely an objectionable expression, not that we wish hypercritically to dissent from terms used by an author, writing evidently in haste, but we are at a loss to see how a man, like Mr. Wood, who is even himself astonished at his present elevation, can be said to have descended. We may appear somewhat too fastidious, but the truth is that Mr. Wood's rise in the world began immediately after his birth, if we may credit the general report that he first saw the light of life in a cellar, at Tiverton, in Devoushire.

His ignorance is naturally deplorable, as his education was of the commonest kind."—p. 11, l. 7.

This is an assertion without foundation. The Alderman has, in the truest sense of the word, had a liberal education, since he was educated gratis at the charity school in his native town.

"His father was a travelling tinker and his mother sold matches."—title. line 19.

This is false. That his father was not a tinker we shall impossible she might have made matches, there is no evidence to prove that she sold them.

With respect to Alderman Wood's father there are many reports in circulation.

It was at one time stated that he had been a dignified clergyman; ard at another that he had been Member for some Western borough, but the truth is that he was neither; he was an honest private soldier, and as we believe an out-pensioner of Chelsea Hospital.

The report of his having been a church dignitary arose from the fact of his having a stall-not indeed such a stall as would necessarily imply the atium cum dignitate of a canon or prebendary, but a stall whereon apples, pears, nuts, follipops, and such other dainties were exposed to sale for the benefit of the rising generation.

The tradition of his having sat in the House of Com mons is in some degree connected with the other; for on tracing it to its origin, we find that it was in consequence of his dealing largely and exclusively in Tiverton, in that well-known nice, crackling, crisp gingerbread called parliament, that he obtained, par excellence, the distinguishing appellation of The Parliament Man!

These facts, we are happy to think, will effectually counteract the dirty malice of the anonymous writer, who would have us think this respectable old body to bave been a tinker.

At page 18, line 8, the author says—
"Little did the humble and unknown Matthew Wood, while sweeping the shop of his master, the Druggist at Exeter, think that in after times his association with a Broom would become

This is ribaldry; -- it goes to nothing: -- or if it goes to any thing, it proves that, which every body knows already, that Wood was a Druggist's shop-boy at Exeter: this we cannot conceive to be any diagrace, and in the allusion to "sweeping out the shop," at which the author affects to sneer, we see only an early turn for neatness and regularity, highly laudable in a lad, who, at that time of his life, could have had no prospect, either from his birth, connexions, or talents, of getting his bread in any other way,

The author then, very flippantly, and not always delicately, entertains his readers with several little amours in which Matthew was involved during his residence at Exeter, and concludes the detail with this most extraordinary remark :—

"But all these things happened before he wore whiskers."

page 32.
What this means we confess ourselves at a loss to surmise, unless it means that his personal appearance is not improved by the two pied quarter-galleries to his face, which distinguish him from other men;—if it be a joke it is a very bad one. He then tells us (p. 34) that-"He became a bag-man, and bumped about the country between two leathern sacks, full of buttons, snuffers, wainutcrackers, ribbands, laces, seissars, and knee-buckles

This is wrong, he always travelled in the drug way, and never was in the botton line in his life.

The author then traces him to Tooley-street, and makes comparisons between Coculus Indicus and Mrs. Wood, and enters into private details, touching domestic matters, with which the author has very little to do, and the public still less; and this, with a discussion upon the advantages of the Insolvent Debtor's Act, and the distress of Matthew at a period when that Act was not in force, occupies twenty-four pages.

Page 66, the author says—
"Wood is about the middle size, of a forbidding appearance, with a kind of perpetual smile quivering over his countemnce the expression of which is alternately insagre and comical; the general contour of his face resembles that of the largest sized living ape, or that of a stone lion hadly carved, for a church gutter, with a mouth adapted for spouting."

Was there ever any thing so disgusting as this? We only ask, if Mr. Wood were as frightful as Hobhouse how could he help it? Besides, what has personal appearance to do with it? Nobody fancies the Queen to be attached to Alderman Wood for his beauty, though perhaps he may encourage his whiskers to please her; but even if she were to admire him we see no reason to disputcher taste. There is, we must allow, an inherent plebeianism in his behaviour, and a rust of awkwardness about him which cannot be rubbed off, but we think he is quite yentrel enough for an Alderman, and when he is in good humour, driving his cabriolet, if it were not for his horse and his servant, and his clumsy driving, (by which he has more than once bumped himself up against posts, and garden walls in the widest part of the Hammersmith-road, and in which he is alone surpassed by the Right Hon. John Charles Wallop, Earl of Portsmouth) he might, while sitting still, be taken for a gentleman.

Page 67, the author says-" Sir William Austin, K. S. C. is the destined husband of his eldest daughter."

This is a decided falsehood. We understand the second daughter has been spoken of as the future Lady A., but there is no foundation for the report as touching Miss Wood.

And in the same page, line 21, he adds-

"And his son, who was on the continent, is to succeed Sir William Gell as Vice-Chamberlain."

This we are inclined to doubt. If it be the son who won the money of young Mr. Thellusson, after dining at the Plazza, we understand he is (not exactly as his father did when bag-man) to take orders, and succeed Mr. Fellowes as her Majesty's domestic chaplain, in the event of that Rev. gentleman obtaining a bishoprick.

The author then relates the anecdote of the Queen's waltz with Sir William Austin, in South Audley-street, in order to show Wood's daughters how to do that matrouly dance, and when she waltzed out of the room, and went away; and adds, "that Lady Hood, who was present, some (we presume this is figurative; "declared" we should substitute) that she never would go into the Wc, as well as every body else, know the story of the waltz to be true, but we doubt Lady Hood's declaration, not because we do not think it very natural for her to have made it, but because she has since been seen in public with the Queen, on an occasion on which she was the sole, single, solitary married woman of rank or title in an assembly of upwards of fifteen hundred persons, and has recently been officially announced as the "confidence in white lines," at Brandewburgh House.

Upon the whole there is a feebleness and frivolity about this pamphlet, at which we do not grieve; for had the author raked up the history of the iron-mines, -the Will,-Plymouth-dock, or even the details of doctoring the beverage of the poor, he might have done the Woods serious harm-his aim is not high-his shaft not bright. and while it might have struck into the sap it only grazes the bark.

That this is not considered to be the case by the friends of Alderman Wood, may be gathered from the fact, that the whole edition of the pamphlet was bought up on Wednesday-ask what bookseller you will for it, he shakes his head, and declares he never heard of it-positively knows nothing about it.

That this suppression of the book is not the Alderman's doing we are pretty certain, for we know enough of him to know, that to any sense of ridicule or exposure, he is perfectly callons; for which stoical insensibility we are ready to give him every credit.

TO JOHN BULL.

Sir.—A Book has been put into my hands, called The Practice of the Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors in England," by Richard Hatt. I had no notion until saw this book that there were so many "Esquires" clerks of the Court; the profits surely must be very great to induce "Esquires" to become Clerks to a Court instituted for the relief of poor debtors, and I should be glad to know who these said "Esquires" are. In the list of Officers of the Court I see John Massey, Esquire, Chief Clerk. Henry Dance, Esquire, Provisional Assignce to Insolvent Estates.

For their Country Department, H. C. Richards, Esq. But perhaps, in this age of radicalism, Mr. Hatt conceives that these "Esquires" are equal in dignity to the truly honourable Gentlemen who preside as Judges of the Court, for they are thus styled—" Commissioners"

H. R. Reynolds, Esq.

J. G. Harris, Esr.

T. B. Bowen, Esq.

Judges and Clerks all "Esquires!" These are the times, Mr. Editor!

But I could scarcely believe my eyes when I came to the "Messenger of the Court'—an "Esquire" I should have thought would be quite sufficient for a Messenger; but no! an Esquire it seems will not suffice, and no less a personage than our most gracious Sovereign appears to have been appointed. For thus it appears:-

Messenger of the Court,

King George!!!
This, Mr. Editor, appears to be the climax; and here I leave it to your notice. I am, Mr. Editor, your constant reader "ONE OF THE BULL FAMILY."

The following gravine letter from a woman who keeps a cook's shop, in Wapping, to her cousin in the country, has been forwarded to us.

TO JOHN BULL.

Sm,-You have not been correctly informed of the handsome mention that was made of Mr. Concannon, at the Appleby election. I was present at that curious scene; and think it deserves an authentic record in your journal.

Old Mr. Wybergh, a red-hot patriot with a white hat, and moreover, Lord THANET'S particular friend, was appointed to propose Mr. Concannon. He read the nomination out of a slip of paper; which, by his poring and hesitating manner, every body was convinced that he then saw, for the first time.

"Gentlemen, I propose, as one of the Representatives of this borough"—(and up went the paper to his eye—)

"Lu—ci—us Con—can—non, Esquire."
When Mr. C. had been declared duly elected, the clerk asked of Mr. Wybergh, how his residence should be described in the indeuture. Mr. Wybergh's reply was shortly and loudly this—" By G., I neither know nor MONTANUS.

TO JOHN BULL.

SIR,-If Mr. Brougham flatters himself that the public is imposed upon by the apparent inattention with which he treats your Paper, he is mistaken: if he he consoled by the hope that his system of ostensible neglect assumes the dignified character of contemning unfounded slander, he deceives himself; for his anxiety to preserve an inte rest in a distant province has increased too considerably, since the commencement of your publication, to allow the belief that his inattention and neglect are other than palpable affectation. In vain will Mr. Brougham persist in his refusal publicly to notice the questions which you have propounded to him, whilst his private conduct evinces the apprehension which your remarks have excited; and futile must be his declaration, already made, that were he to notice all the calumnies with which he is assailed, his time would be entirely occupied," if he also employ emissaries to contradict the rumours necessarily attendant upon his vacillating unmanly course. The great ambition of her Majesty's Attorney-General has been to represent the county of Westmoreland in Parliament, and thereby to counterbalance the over-weaning influence (as he is pleased to term it) of the Noble House of Lowther in the northern counties. Twice has he essayed in vain; twice has he boasted, in language unrivalled even in the annals of electioneering contests, that the power of his opponents should be terminated; and as often has he pledged himself to rescue the independence of Westmoreland from the trammels of aristecratical influence, and triumphantly to wave the banner of radical reform from the height of Cæsar's Tower. But his vaunting threats have recoiled; his promises have proved baseless as his principles. Lato this, his native land, has your Paper pursued him; it is read with avidity throughout the county, and the Honorable and Learned Member for Winchilsea has taken the alarm. His fond and fostered hopes hourly diminish; and, to my knowledge, he has written to a friend entreating him " to contradict the calumnious reports of John Bull," and expressing his alarm that he may be injured in the opinion of his friends in Westmoreland!!!

His friends in Westmoreland! Where will he now find them? There was a time when some of those, who fancied a counterpoise in the representation of the county was essential, supported him because they believed him honest; there was a time when some of the honest Yeomanry were misled by the specious language of an ingeni-ous advocate, and placed implicit credit in the assertions of one who told them all his time was spent in endeavouring to ameliorate the condition and to better the education of the lower classes. But the tide has ebbed; it has been discovered that at the moment when he was declaiming against Borough-mongering factions, he was himself returned for the Borough of Winchilses; that his object was to put down the power of one Noble House, by raising that of another; and, above all, that he was ready to abandon a client, whose innocence he pledged himself to prove.

Mr. Brougham has now no friends in Westmoreland, save those whose friendship ought to make him blush. Does he really believe that the countenance of my Lord of Thanet, aided by a packed association, and a Kendal rabble, (which even he disdained to address) will ever succeed in returning the Queen's Attorney-General, or any other minion of the Hereditary High Sherift of Westmoreland, as a Knight of that shire to Parliament? Does he imagine that the puny illegal influence of the returning officer will biass the respectable independent freeholders who have opposed and ever will oppose him? Is the Maidstone History forgotten? Sleeps the remembrance of Hone's anonymous supporter? No. Has the House of Lords been insulted by the hited advocate of adultery? Has the confidence of the country been betrayed by the unwarranted detention of an important communication? Yes.

Let Mr. Brougham rest assured, that if the ill-fated patronage, under which he has twice vainly attempted to effect his darling object, were insufficient to render all future efforts abortive; if the barefaced deceit, which he has practised upon those whose votes he solicited, failed to render him the object of their abhorrence; he has at length stood forth, arrayed in colours, which have effectually lowered him in the estimation of those he would gladly call his constituents, as well as of the whole REGULUS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The King, for the first time since the decease of the infant Princess Elizabeth, was on horseback on Wednesday, from two till four o'clock. He was accompanied in his ride by Sir B. Bloomfield, towards Rottingdean. He was received every where with the most affectionate marks of respect by all descriptions of persons.

The church and chapel of Brighton have now become so crowded on a Sunday, that the King has ordered service to be performed in the afternoon, by an additional clergyman, the expences of which he will defray himself.

The King remains at Brighton, but has not gone beyond the grounds of the Pavilion. His Majesty has seen no company since the death of the infant Princess Elizabeth.

ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND.—The King, it is understood, when he visits Ireland, will honour the Archbishop of Curragh and Lord Bianey's soats with his presence. It is supposed His Majesty will remain one month in Ireland, and a considerable portion of that time in Dublin.

The Paincess Elizabeth.—The ceremony of embalming The Paircess Elizabeth.—The ceremony of emassing the infant body of the Princess Elizabeth was performed on Tuesday, at eleven o'clock, in the presence of Sir Andrew Hulliday, by one of his Majesty's Sergeant-Surgeons, Peter M'Gregor, esq. assisted by Arthur Tegart, esq. of Pall-mall, apothecary to the Duke of Clarence. The following is a copy of the official report to his Majesty of the appearance on opening the body: On examining the body of the infant Princess Elizabeth, the daughter of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Clarence, in presence of Sir W. Knighton, bart. and Sir A. Halliday, kat. the following appearances were observed:

The whole abdomen was uncommonly distended; and on examining the cavity, several ounces of yellow fluid were found covering the bowels which were found much distended with air, and in a high state of inflammation. On further examining, introsusception was found to have taken place for the space of six inches; at the junction of the small with the great intestines, adhesion had taken place; the inflammation and thickening surrounding the affected parts were very extensive, and the stricture was so complete, that the smallest probe could not be passed through the obstructed bowel without lacerating it.

Hence the cause of the Princess's death.

"In every other respect I found this infant as healthy a subject as it has ever fallen to my lot to examine after death.

The coffin is covered with crimson velvet, decorated with silver nails and appropriate ornaments.

Yesterday, at a quarter past seven o'clock, the coffin was put into a coach and six, belonging to the King, in which were two gentlemen of the househould, and conveyed to Windsor for interment. Only one mourning coach followed, in which were four persons connected with the funeral.

THE QUEEN'S HOUSEHOLD.—Lady Hood went into waiting on her Majesty this day for three months.

The Queen, in order to evince her high sense of Lady Anne Hamilton's attachment to her Majesty's person, has appointed her Mistress of the Robes, being the highest honour which her Majesty and confer many har Majesty can confer upon her.

Welearn from good authority that Mr. Madocks, M. P. has not accepted, as has been stated in some of the papers, of the office of one of her Majesty's vice-chamberlains; he has declined it, having no time to spare from his more useful occur. pations in the country, being, as our enquiries inform us, a great improver of land in North Wales, where he has rescued great improver or land in North water, where he has rescued several thousand acres from the sea by embankments on a new contruction; a much more laudable and patriotic employment. We are glad this gentleman is returning to his senses with the great mass of his deluded countrymen, who cannot have the sense of the sen return too soon to their former industrious habits of life, the best mode of remedying any evils they have to complain of.

A Gentleman just returned from Paris, pledges his honour that the style in which Bergami lived there was superior to that of most of the French and English Noblemen's establishments. This perfectly accords with the undisputed statement of Lord Lowther; and we would therefore again ask, whence this favoured minion continues to derive his means for such extravagantly splendid exhibitions?

Two companies of the 41st regiment have marched from Glasgow for Fort George.

Three companies of the 8th Veteran Battalion, which have been doing duty at Aberdeen, marched last week from the barracks, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Chamber-layne, and immediately embarked with their numerous wives and families, on board three smacks and a schooner, for Leith; thence to proceed to Ireland, where the regiment is to be disbanded. That part of the same battalion lately stationed at Fort George has also embarked for Leith on a similar desti-

The 6th Veteran Battalion, now quartered at Sheerness, are under orders to march to Edinburgh, where they are to be dis-banded, and are to be replaced at Sheerness by the 71st regiment

Tuesday his Royal Highress the Commander in-Chief held a Levee at his office at the Horse Guards, which was attended by a numerous train of Military Noblemen and Gentlemen.

An elopement took place a few dwys since in the fashionable world. The lady of an Officer of Dysgoons, marly allied to some of the most respectable families, stoped with an Officer in the Surrey Militla; they were traced to Kingston, where the lady was discovered and brought to town.

FURRAL OF Mr. Scott.—Friday, about ten o'cleck, the remains of the Inte John Scott, Eaq. who felt is the Duel of Friday, the 16th uit. were removed in a hearse from his lodgings in York-street, Covent-Garden, to St. Martin's Charch, and interred with great solemnity. Fourteen mourning coaches, and eight private carriages, formed the mournful procession.

The Election for the Alderman of the Ward of Bridge, in

The Election for the Alderman of the Ward of Bridge, he the room of Sir M. Blozam, resigned, came on last Thursday. The Candidates were J. Gerratt, Eaq. an inhabitant of the Ward, and Mr. Sheriff Williams. The numbers, at the close of the poll for that day, were for Mr. Sheriff Williams 23, Mr. Garratt 19.—Second day, Mr. Sheriff Williams 56.—Mr. Garratt 48.—Third day, yesterday, the poll closed at four o'clock, when the Lord Mayor declared the numbers to be on the day's poll—For Mr. Garratt 39.—Mr. Sheriff Williams 25. It will be seen by the state of the last day's poll, that Mr. Garratt will have a majority of six upon the gross poll, but as a scrutiny will have a majority of six upon the gross poil, but as a scrutiny was demanded on the part of Mr. Sheriff Williams, the Lord Mayor adjourned his final decision till Monday, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Montague and Mr. Norton attended as counsel for Mr.

Garratt, and Mr. Bolland for Mr. Sheriff Williams. Several votes were rejected for the Sheriff.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India. House, when the following ships were thus timed, viz:—Albion, Capt. C. Weller, for Madras and Bengal, to be affect the 17th of April, and to seil on its voyage on the 17th of May; Kingston, Capt. W. A. Bowen; Barrose, Capt. H. Liuschin **Post City Bible Association.**—The Eighth Anniversary of this laudable Society was held on Tuesday last in St. Bride's Charbh, Richard Clarke, esq. Chamberlan, in the Chair. The Report of the last year's proceedings was highly gratifying.

The Committee of City Lands made a Report, recommending an application to Parliament against the Bill fee repealing part of the Act of Charles II., restricting buildings on the banks of the Thames between London Bridge and the Temple, when some discussion ensued. The Report was agreed to by a considerable majority, and a petition to the Heuse of Commons adopted, and ordered to be presented as usual by the Sheriffs and the Remembrancer.

Annopers of one of the Bull Family.—When the Radical Member for Norfolk was, a few years since, in ill odour with the Norwich weavers, and others of the mob, who have been latterly bribed to shout in his train, he made his appearance among his deluded worshippers the "Agriculturals," as they call themselves, on Norwich Hill. No sooner was this known to the sovereign people, than they flocked to the Hill, fraught with every kinded unaneous intestiles, that the dunghills, dro. would supply, and pelted the poor patrict; in-piteous flight. Nay, a collection of mortar, and brick rubbish accidentally at hand on the hill, began to move in a way that favoured "agricultural" was inspired, as this critical juncture, with a "brilliant idea;" for having an unruly ox he a pen, which he had brought for sale, he let him loose in the rear of the Patriot's assailants, and soon produced so complete a dispersion, that the personal friends of the aforesaid patriot were enabled, by dint of great exertion, to carry their here through the back gate of a stable-yard, belonging to the Angel Inn, and to lodge him snug in a coal-hole, till is was judged safe for him to sneak off for Holkham.

Howard and Gibbs's Bankruptey. The Commissioners met again yesterday, at one o'clock, in the Court of Common Pleas, and proceeded to investigate further claims under the Commission against the Bankrupts. The claimants, although the Court was crawded, came forth slowly, not being prepared with the necessary proof of their debts, and the Commissioners complained much of this neglect. They had appointed four additional meetings, prior to the day of proving for assignees, for the convenience of the Creditors, and now none came forward; when that day arrived, in all probability, they would be overwhelmed with claimants.

A Gentleman named Shaw claimed to prove a debt of 25tl.

received by the Bankrupts on his account, for Annuities granted by the Marquis of Worcester.

The Bankrupts objected to this proof. The Annuity in question, together with several others, amounting in all to 1,8001, had been recovered by a levy on the Marquis's proceed. perty; but though the levy was for 1,600l. the proceeds under it were not more than 1,100l.; the claim of Mr. Shaw, therefore, must be paid in proportion only of 1,100i. to 1,8001.

Mr. Shaw insisted on his right to prove for the whole sum, as there had been a Sheriff's levy on his account.

This was denied by the Bankrupts, and the Commissioners ordered the proof to stand over till investigation could be gone into.

Mr. Davis next put in his claim to prove for a debt of 751. under the following circumstances: having an annuity paid through the hands of the Bankrupts, and being doubtful of his security, he agreed to give the Bankrupts 751. on consideration of their guaranteeing payment of the annuity, their guarantee being at un end he submitted he had a right to proof for the 751, as for a debt.

Mr. Howard strongly objected to this claim. The annuity had been paid up to this time, Mr. Davis had lost nothing: on the contrary, he had received interest fer his money at the rate of 9 per cent. and had received it for a very considerable time.

The claim was rejected. At three o'clock there being no other creditors present, the Commissioners adjourned the Meeting.

Court of King's Bench.— Saturday.

The Court met and disposed of some undefended causes, and then adjourned to the 16th of April.

SURREY SESSIONS.

ATTEMPTED RESCUE BY A DESPREATE GANG.—Lewis Davis and George Hale, both desperate characters, were, on Tuesday, indicted for feloniously aiding and shotting a num-Testay, indicted for fetomously aiding and anothing a number of persons, not in custody, in an attempt to rescue one withiam Jones, a person charged with a capital felony in the custody of three Officers of the Police. The prisoners attempted to prove an alibi, but failed. The Jury found them Guilty; and the Court immediately sentenced them to the extremest punishment the law admits—two years' imprisonment is the Manua of Correction. in the House of Correction.

William Phillips and Thomas Walgrave were indicted for breaking open and robbing a watch-hox belonging to the Lambeth Trust, on the night of January 21st, and stealing a blunderbuss, dec. They were found Guilty, and being bad characters, were sentenced to seven years' transportation.

POLICE.

Bow-Street.—Thurslay a Jew, who gave his name Isaac Allen, was examined before Richard Birnie, Esq. the Sitting Magistrate, charged with defrauding Sarah Hopkins, widow, of the sum of 61. under the following circumstances:—About six months ago, the prisoner, dressed as a Gentleman's servant, went into the shop of the prosecutrix, in Little St. Andrewstreet, Seven Diais. A Jew, with a clothes bag on his back, followed him in, and wanted to purchase a bundle of clothes which the prisoner had under his arm. The prisoner refused to let the Jew have them, and stated to the prosecutrix that he would sell them for half the money, rather than the Jew should have them; the Jew then left the shop, and the prisoner asked to leave the bundle as he was going further on. Soon after he was gone, the same Jew came into the shop and stated to the presecutrix that if she would bargain with the prisoner and get the clothes for 61. he would give her 6s. for the bargain, to which she consented, and he then gave her the 6s. and left the shop. On the prisoner's return, she offered him 61. for the bundle of clothes, consisting of three coats, which he readily accepted, and went away; the Jew never returned, and on examining the coats, they were found not to be worth one quarter of the money.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET .- On Wednesday Mr. Stemman, a respectable news-vender, was summoned by Mr. Stockdale, of respectance news-venucr, was summoned by Mr. Slockdale, of Pail Mall, to answer to an information for refusing to pay the stamp duty of sixpence to a receipt for 14l. which George Manning, clerk to Mr. Stockdale, produced to him to sign for that amount. By the 55th of George III. a penalty of 10l. attaches to the principal or agent, who refuses to give to, or pay for one, to a party paying him money. Mr. Stemman pleaded ignorance of the statute in question. He was fined 101, and costs.

An Impudent Mendicant Impostor .- A ruffian-looking Freechman, of more than six feet, was brought up by an officer of the Mendicity Society, who found him acting impostorship in the Hampstead road. The fellow had his hand and arm tied of the Mendicity Society, who found min actually in the Hampstead road. The fellow had his hand and arm tied up in a huge sling, as if disabled; but having before been taken up, the imposition was detected, and he was punished by the Mendicity Society. In this instance, he made a daring resistance to the officer, who was nearly roughly handled by the populace, until he secured the fellow, loosened his sling and handages, and shewed them the imposition; when the people as satisfied, assisted in apprehending him. He said he had so satisfied, essisted in apprehending him. He said he had served in the English army thirty years, and dared not go home, and he had no parish in this country. He was committed till the Sessions.

UNION HALL .-- A Police Committee has been sitting here the last week to enquire into the great increase of crime in the county of Surrey; the committee consisted of twelve magistrates. They examined several witnesses; some plan will be adopted to suppress the evil, either by increasing the pay of the officers, or appointing additional patroles.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

-The Alisma Plantago, or Water Plantain, said to be a certain cure for the hydrophobia, is found in abandance in this neighbourhood, particularly in the Mermaid Pits, near the banks of the river Lark, and in the water courses adjoining the meadows.

Kell, of St. John's College.—Bachelors in Civil Law: W. C. Curteis, of Trinity Hall, and W. Arcedeckne, of St. John's College.— Masters of Arts: The Rev. C. Wolston, of St. John's College, and the Rev. J. Roby, of Emmanuel College.—The Rev. J. Lodge, M. A. Fellow of Magdalene College, was on Wednesday last, elected a Foundation Fellow of that Society.

Three new Craven Scholarships of 501. a year having been lately instituted, pursuant to a decree of the High Court of Chancery, from the estates bequeathed by Lord Craven, for the reward of classical learning in the University, subject to the same regulations as the two former Craven Scholarships; these prizes have been contested in an examination by twentytwo candidates: they were adjudged on Tuesday to George Long, Thomas Babington Macaulay, and Henry Malden, all Students of Trinity College. COLCHESTER.—An institution has been founded in this city, entitled, "The Loyal Colchester Association." to counteract the diffusion of di-loyal and seditious principles, and to support His Majesty's Government. The members of the association have resolved, by pecuniary contributions, to encourage the establishment and continuance of leval associations of the freeburgesses. At a most respectable meeting of the friends of the institution, held last week, Sir G. H. Smyth, Bart. in the chair, a liberal subscription was entered into for its support.

COVENTRY .- Our trade here is better and improving, and all hands are employed, and receive good wages.

Dover.—A smuggling vessel, apparently foreign built, came on shore on Sunday morning last, on Mampton Hill, on the Kentish coast, and was hailed by a considerable number of persons, who seized the sentinel on the blockade service, disarmed him, tied his hands and feet to prevent him from viving the alarm to the next sentinel, and run the cargo of the gailey, which they loaded in carts, and quickly conveyed away, and the boat immediately sailed.

EDINBURGH.—A man named Alexander, who lived a retired and penurious life, was found dead a few days since, in his room at St. John's Hill. The body was in a state of putrefaction. He had been missing for nearly two months, but as he was in the habit of wandering the country seeking alms, his absence was not much thought of. Property to the amount of near 5,000l. was found in the house, 700l. of which, in Bank notes, was found at the bottom of an old clock-case

On Saturday last Mr. Codringion's Foxhounds met at Shillingford-bridge, from whence they drew Coxwell Gorfes, and immediately unknownelled a fine old Fox which afforded them the most unprecedented sport witnessed this season. He made for Eastthrop, in Wilts, where being headed, he took back through Coleshill, tried the earths at Hastings Wood, where being foiled, he crossed the Canal and made for Farringdon Woods; crossed the Inclosures for Buckland, and was viewed dead beat into Pusey Furze, where he was killed in full view, after a run of one hour and 25 minutes without a check. Of a most numerous field, Mr. Corbett, of without a check. Of a most numerous neig, mr. Cornett, or Sandern, on his celebrated grey horse Highflyer, was the only man in at the death, having dashed through the Canal, which proved an imsuperable impediment to the less venturous riders. The fencing was the stiffest ever known by the most veteran GLOUGESTER.—An occurrence took place at Stow in the Wold on Monday week. Mrs. George, of the Union Isn, being indisposed sent for an ounce of salts to a neighbouring druggist; the shopman, by mistake sent an ounce of Oxalic Acid, from which, however, she has recovered.

GLASGOW.—Business becomes daily more brisk; muslins and printed goods are in great request; the bleach fields and and printed goods are in great request; the bleach fields and calenderers are fully employed; weavers are wanted for every kind of work. The foreign trade at the Bromiens has increased within the last two years.

Guildford .—The neighbourhood of Chilworth, was thrown lato the greatest consternation Thursday se'onight, by an alarm of a fire having broken out in the building called the Stove, at the gunpowder mills at that place, where a considerable quantity of powder was in the last state of manufacture. An engine was promptly sent from Guildford; and we are happy to state the fire was got under before it reached the destructive material.

INVERNESS.—We trust that the revival of trade, which is now apparent in many parts, will give that relief to agriculturists which Parliament cannot give, farther than listening patiently to the complaints which, though just, are, under present circumstances, useless.

KENDAL.—The following Lusus Nature has occurred here. A cow, belonging to a person named Isaac Smith, on Monday last, produced the following extraordinary animal:— The head resembles that of a shark—the mouth on one side is open to the car—the hind feet are turned out, and the fore feet turned in- and the tail comes out in the middle of the back!

LEICESTER. - The Subscription forwarded from here, containing at least 20,000 inhabitants, towards the Queen's plate, amounted exactly to five pounds eleven shillings!

LINCOLN.—The carriage of Colonel Sibthorpe, M. P. for this city was upset on Friday the 23d ult. The Colonel, his brother the Rev. H. W. Sibthorpe and his lady were in it; the Colonel, it is feared, has suffered an injury in the spine, which has occa-sioned paralysis in the lower part of his back. The accident was occasioned by the linch-pin having been wantouly and wickedly taken from one of the wheels while the carriage was standing in the city.

Northampton.—We stated in our last number that a respectable farmer named Clarke, of Charwelton, was shot by a man named Haynes, while he was cutting some hay. Since he was committed to prison, it has been deemed necessary to apprehend Mrs. Clarke his widow, as an accessary to the murder. After an examination, she has been committed to prison on the charge.

Norwich.—Our Corporation are about to present the free dom of the city to Captain Parry, in a box made of part of the mast of the Hecla.

NOTTINGHAM AND DERBY.—The Framework-knittets had NOTTINGHAM AND DERRY.—The Framework-knitters had a general turn out on Monday last, for the purpose of altering the statement price for work, agreed upon by the hosists of those counties in September, 1819: and we are informed too that the kind of work done there is much in demand, which, together with a long list of hosiers having previously explessed their approbation of this proceeding of the workmen, and some of the hosiers having already set to work their men at the statement, a uniform compliance of the whole is very soon

Statement, a uniform compliance of the whole is very soon expected to take place.

Oxford, March 3.—Monday last, the Rev. Charles Hyde Wollaston, M. A. of King's College, and the Rev. William Pearse, M. A. of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, were admitted ad cundem. The Rev. Daniel Davies, B. D. A. of Brasenose College, was elected a Fell low of that Society.

SHERNESS.—An inquiry has been going on here into the conduct of three officers of the Ordnance Department. Two Commissioners of the Board with Mr. Ward the Secretary, have been carrying on the inquiry. It is understood, that the officers are suspended.

Wishber.—A few days ago a chesnut horse, standing four-teen and a half haads high, the property of Mr. N. Taylor, of Leverington, for a trifling wager leaped over the turnpike gate leading to Long Sutton, carrying ten stone and a half; the gate is fifteen and a half hands high. Some time previous with the same weight he cleared a gate the same height nearly.

ACCIDENTS. OFFENCES, &c.

Lord Molineux unfortunately broke his log while hunting a few days since, with the Melton hounds, in consequence of his horse falling with him.

A singular fraud was, on Monday last, successfully practised on Mrs. Stone, a respectable school mistress at Deptford. A young man, of genteel address, waited on her under pretance of paying her a legacy of 501. left her by Mrs. Harris of Bath; he produced a letter signed by Thomas Watson, of that city, an attorney, enclosing a draft on Messrs. Fuller for the sum. Mrs. Stone treated the young man and paid him his carriage expences, amounting to 41. 13s. 4d. at the same time giving him the remainder of a 51. note, and some refreshment. On presenting the check the bankers knew nothing of the supposed drawer. drawer.

DARING ROBBERY.—Wednesday Mr. Hope, the Deputy Clerk of the Peace for the county of Surrey, while attending to the duties of his office in the Court at the Surrey Sessions, was robbed of a pocket-book, containing two checks for 1501. each Dreadful Fire at Surinam .- By the ship Streva, Captain Affleck, from Surinam, who left that place on that 1st of Feb. we learn, that eight days previous to his departure a dreadful fire broke out in that settlement, and nearly destroyed the town of Paramaribo; 392 houses, and including stores and back huildings, were reduced to askes.

The loss is estimated at 20,000 guilders. The Streva, lying near the wharf, was twice on fire before she could be warped into the middle of the

A fire broke out on Monday evening about seven o'clock, at Mr. Hamilton's, at Lower Clapton, which commend the house, and the flames communicated to Mr. Janson's, nearly adjoining, which was rearly reduced to a heap of ruins. It is said that a female in the service of Mr. Hamilton, lost all her wearing apparel, and nearly 1001, the amount of her savings for many years.

SCICIDE.—On Saturday the 3d inst. a gentleman's servant put a period to his existence by hanging himself to the bedpost, at his lodgings, the King's Head public-house, Albemarlestreet, Piceadilly. The deceased had been out of a situation for about three weeks, during which time be always appeared in a very low and desponding state, although not in embarrassed circumstances. An inquest has been held on the body, who returned a verdict of—Insanity.

Felong and Suicide.—A man named Peter Fisher was appreheaded about five o'clock on Saturday se'dnight in the ber of Mr. Brewerton's house, the Swan, in the Strand, endeavouring to ferce the till with a chissel. He was conveyed to the watch house of St. Martip's parish, where he was locked up in a cell by himself. About ten o'clock the officer found, on going to take him befere a magistrate, that he had hanged himself by his neckcloth to the bar of the window. He was a shabby his neckcloth to the bar of the window. He was a shabby looking man about 40 years of age. The Jury who sat on his

He had gone from his lodgings. with some of the Brandenburgh House mobs several days be-The skull was found cleaved in two, and the brain. protruding, as if from the blow of an axe or sabre. The unfortunate man appeared to be about thirty years of age; was dressed in a blue coat, buff-coloured waistcoat, trowsers, and boots, but without a hat; his pockets were turned inside out, and he wore a bow of white ribband on his breast, and had, in every respect, the appearance of a Gentleman. An Inquisition was taken on Thursday, at the Evelyn's Arms Taverh, Deptford, before Mr. Carter, the Coroner for Keat. After deliberating for several hours, the majority of the Jury came to a decision—"That the deceased was found drowned, having marks of violence, but how or by what means he came there was unknown to them."

Monday evening his Majesty's free pardon for Joseph White and Michael Harley was received at Newgate.

The establishment in question is the first and only one in the whole kingdom formed upon the positive and known secure principles of Fire and Life Insurance Companies, in which the working classes may insure for allowances, medical attendance, and medicine during sickness, and small sums payable at death. In speaking of this admirable and highly useful establishment, a Cambridge Paper says-

"Of the respectability of an establishment under the pa-tronage of the Duke of Gloucester, and of which the Duke of Bedford is President, and Messrs. Frys and Chapman the Treesurers, it would be needless to offer a single word, and its disinterestedness, or (if we may be allowed the expression) its disinterestedness, or (if we may be allowed the expression) has perfect distinctness from all political bias or motive, it were pretty evident from a perusal of the list of Vice-Presidents, where may be seen abreast the names of Lord John Russell and Mr. Wilberforce, Alderman Wood and Sir W. Curtis, and lastly, though not the least remarkable, occur the names of S. C. Whitbread and the Rev. Mr. Cunningham, of Harrow,

We agree fully with the sentiments of the "Cambridge Independent Press," and most strongly beg to urge the necessity of every man who has a dependance on his own labour for supplying the company of the port, or a family for whom he ought to provide in case of death, to attend well to the old adage—" make hay while the sun shines;" nor can we omit to point out to every person the eligible opportunity which is offered through the medium of the General Benefit Insurance Company, of securing endow-ments and apprentice fees for children, and many other impor-

HRLING'S LACE (of the real Point and Brussels Inbric), 147, Straad, man Somerset House, removed from 392, Strand,—G. F. URLING and CO, beg to inferse the Fashionable World, that they have prepared for the Season a various and extensive Assestment of their PATRNT LACE DIGESSES, from three Guineas to one hundred Guineas seaks some of which, from recent improvements, they humbly presume to compare with the most perfect foreign productions. Also a great variety of Veils, Searfs, Squares, Laces, Neis, Ker of every description. This peculiarly clear and transparent Article having, in the higher sircles, superseded the use of common Lace, which becomes rough and full of libro on the first washing, the Patentees respectfully apprise the Public, that the latter is frequently starched to conceal its defects, and make it resemble Urling's Lace, which therefore, can only be relied upon as genuine at their Whelesale and Retail Establishment in London, or of the Country Dealers supplied by them. Berry Article is distinguished by a Seai, with the Patentee's Initials, "G.F. U. and Co." and the words, "by the (late) Queen's submirity." Specimens, shewing the superiority of Urling's Lace over common Lace, may be seen to Ackermanu's Repository, La Belle Assemblee, and other fashionable works, and may be had gratis, by application, post-paid, to G.F. Urling and Co.

ARTIFICIAL TEETH, on, an unprecedented principle, by Mr. GRAY, (Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, in Landen,) constructed so as to answer all the purposes of the human Teeth, in mestication, articulation, appearance, see, and to remain perfectly secure in their places by the pressure of the atmosphere; thereby avoiding pinning to stamps, tying, twisting wires, or fastening springs to the adjoining teeth, or any attachment whatsoever to the remaining teeth; and consequently, instead of injuring, afford them support. These Artificial Tech may be taken out, and replaced by the wearer with the greatest facility. To those who require whole or half sets, Mr. G. undertakes, at his own risk, to furnish pieces which shall answer all the purposes above described, without the annowing incumbrance of the spiral springs, which are usually attached to such pieces—25, Old Burlington-street.

"We cannot but regard this volume as a very valuable accession to the Chirurgical Library, not of our own Country alone, but of Europe, it requires, as we have already observed, to be methodized and condensed; but it is written with an air of candour, with a spirit of research, with a full and comprehensive knowledge of the subject, an ardent love of it, and a successful pursuit of it, which deservedly place its Author in the Bratishak of Ophthalmic Surgery. "The work of which we have now given an account to the Society, evinces in its Author, a conspicuous talent for observation, great experience, and much of that ingenious tpirit which is ever fartile in resources; and so useful in the practical sciences. It is, in short, one of the best works ever published on the Disease of the Eye."—Translation of the Report published by order of the Philosophical Magazine.

PATENT ECONOMICAL and UNIVERSAL LAMP,

PATENT ECONOMICAL and UNIVERSAL LAMP, adapted to the CONSERVATORY. The same principle on which this Lamp acts as a Chamber or Night Light, so universally admired and patronized by thousa ds of families and persons, is so peculiarly applicable to the Conservatory, that the Patentee's induced to present it to the Public as a protector of delicate Plants and Flowers from the effects of frosty or cold nights. Two of these Lamps, which add elegance to utility, have been proved, by many experiments made by a respectable Florist in his own Green-house, to have kept the thermometer at 40 to 41 degrees for twelve hours, during a severe frost, at the small expense in spermacetic of of two-pence each; and what adds to its singular advantage is, that its heat can be increased or otherwise at pleasure. The Night or Chamber Lamp gives an invariable light for twelve hours or more—ready at the moment if is wanted—bearing any motion perfectly safe—and in expense not half that of a rash-light; typice 10s. in neat Japanned Stands; and 20s. in elegant Imperial Metal, or Bronze, suited to the chambers of the Nobility and adjuents and the Conservatory Lamp, all Giass, 30s. each.—Sold by 7. Pearce and Co. Agents to the Patentee, 269, 8t. Clenient's Strand, who, to secure the reputation of this Invention from the effects of bad oil, are bound to sell none but pure and genuine Spermaceti.—Families in the Country may venture to send their Orders, without the possibility of a disappointment.—Letters (post-paid) will meet with prompt attention.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY.

Lerd Calthurpe presented petitions from the wool manufacturers of Frome, and Shepton Mallett, complaining of the duty on foreign wool, which compelled them to pay a higher price for their article in the raw state, and was injurious, not only to the manufacturers, but to the landed interests.

The Earl of Liverpool was of opinion, that if the agriculturists did not enjoy the advantages of a free exportation, the importation of foreign wool should be subjected to a duty.— The petition was laid on the table.

The Rarl of Blessington, withdrew a notice for papers respecting the duties on goods imported from Ireland to England, and from England to Ireland, with a view to see if some thing could not be done to benefit the Irish manufacturers, and provide them a proper market.

The Marquis of Lansdowns observed, that much of the disaress had arisen from the state of domestic credit in that coun-He thought a removal of the restrictions on banking comceras would operate greatly in favour of Ireland.

The Earl of Liverpeol agreed in the propriety of the Noble Marquis's siggestions. The subject had not escaped the attention of His Majesty's Government.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY. The General Inclosure Bill went through a Committee. WEDNESDAY.

Lord Sidmouth presented a petition from the son of the late Earl of Strathmore, praying that his claim to the Earldom of Strathmore be acknowledged .- Referred to the Committee of Privileges .- Adjourned. THURSDAY.

The General Inclosure Act Amendment, and the Bristol Gas Light Bill were passed.

Mr. Brogden brought up from the House of Commons the Flax Encouragement Bill which was read a first time.—Adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY.

The Sheriffs of the City of London presented a petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, &c. against the London Wharfs Bill, which was laid on the table.

A petition was presented by Lord A. Hamilton, from the Burgesses of the town of Inverary, in Aberdeen, charging the Magistrates with malversations in their office, against which, they could get no relief in the Court of Session in Scotland who, when admitting the truth of the charges, said, that according to the laws of Scotland, they had no right of uction; they therefore prayed relief.—It was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Butterworth presented a petition from the parish of St. Dunstan's in the West, against the Roman Catholic Claims: The introduction of Catholics into the great Councils of the nation would be contrary to the spirit of the Bill of Rights, and subversive of the leading principle upon which the Government of the Realm was settled at the Constitution. They dreaded the effects of bringing into power, men, who profess a religion, present active in its operation in this country, more especially since the revival of the Order of the Jesuits by the present Pope, and the establishment of a College of that Order in the centre of the kingdom, &c.—The Hon. Geatleman observed that it was not on account of Catholics holding the doctrines of transubstantiation, the adoration of the Virgin Mary, and the sacrifice of the Mass, that our ancestors excluded them from office and Seats in Parliament, but in consequence of their intolerant spirit in civil and religious affairs, and their dangerous acknowledgment of alfordigh supreme jurisdiction.—The petition was laid on the table.

Mr. Hume, previous to going into a Committee on the Army Estimates, proposed a resolution, comparing the present mili-tary establishments, and expences of the country with those of 1792, and declarative of the necessity of approximating thereto as much as possible.

Lord Castlereagh contended, that the present was not the time for a proposition of the nature of the Hon. Gentleman's.

Mr. Hume said, he moved it in the way of instruction to the Committee, as a principle on which they should act.

Lord Palmerstan considered the proposition as anomalous, before going into a Committee, and moved the previous question.—The House divided—For it, 98.—Against it, 74.—The House went into the Committee. Lord Palmerston rose to move the Estimates, the principal stures which they would exhibit, were reduction of the establishments, and ourtailment of expences, wherever Government could exercise its influence, and wherever any increase had taken place that increase was unavoidable. The Noble Lord then entered into a statement of items and regulations—the result would be, that there would be found a diminution of men to the extent of 9,800 and of expence, to the amount of 150,0001. The clothing, which cost 18,5001 would of course, be annecessary. The reduction on the first head would amount to 374,0001. In the Staff there was a diminution of 7,000 occasioned by the reduction of Mujors General, on certain stations; in Hospital and Medical expences, 3,000 in the Volunteers cosps, 19,000l.; and upon the whole, among other items, a general reduction in expense, in amount, to the sum he had stated. The next head was the Commissariat, and the treops in India, in the course of which he enumerated the various items. He then stated the estimates for the present year, as follow: — Ordinarles, 6,045,9681. Extraordinaries, 1,030,0001. Commissarlat, 501,5691. Barrack, 287,5001. Training Militia, 90,0001. The Finance Committee had estimated the expence at 8,500,000t. thus it would be seen that the present estimates were considerably less. In comparison with the sums voted last year, the savings were as follow: —Upon the Ordinaries, 144,9981. Extraordinaries, 200,0001. Commissariat, 74,0001. Barracks, 117,0001. Training Militia, 40,0001. for clothing Irish Yeomany, 50,0001. forming the Veteran Battalion, 40,0001. The whole of these reductions, in comparison with the last year, would amount to 767,0001. The Noble Lord then noticed some observations made on a former night, in respect of the establishments of 1792, and proceeded 10 shew the necessity for an increase in the expenditure. The number of troops at the Jorgen period were estimated at 43,578 but the never proceed so low. The present increase 43,578 but the larger reduced so low. The present increase was owing to the larger establishment, in order to provide for their military defence. In 1792, the practice of enlisting men for a whole serhe might per and the Crown could not remove h thus a harmon in troops on foreign service could only be effected by sending out whole regiments. The number of troops employed on foreign stations was 52,000 men. The Noble Lord then referred to the objection taken on a former evening by the Hon. Gent. (Mr. Hume) to the increase in the Life and Foot Gaurds. He would ask, however, whether these troops had not by their valour abroad, and their conduct at home deserved the advantages they enjoyed. With referat none deserved the advantages they enjoyed. With reference to the no-system of 1792, the Noble Lord contended, that if the country were to have an army, they might as well have it well organized, or have none at all. The Staff was a material ingredient in the establishment. After various other observations, he concluded with moving "that the land forces of last year, distinguished into bodies of $1,468 Regulars, and 11,694 Marines (exclusive of those in the pay of the East India Company) be continued for the present year."

Colonet Davies contended, that a Committee ought to be appointed to ascertain how far reduction in the establishment could be carried. Comparing the present estimates with those of 1819, an increase would be found of 50,5721. He extered into a comparison with our military force of 1787, with the present establishment, to shew the necessity for a Committee, and moved that the Chairman do report progress.

Mr. Daussen thought the most rigid economy the only means for relieving the country, and was of opinion that of all parts of our national system the army was that part we could best dispense with.

Mr. Macdonald commented on the various items of expen ditures and thought it would be just to reduce the present rate of pay 10 per cent. and to give notice to those who might hereafter the army, of a considerable reduction in their pay and allowances.

Mr. C. Grant was of opinion reduction must be gradually made.

Sir H. Vivian considered it impolitic to reduce our military establishments down to the standard of 1792. He confessed he looked at the state of Naples with a jealous eye, and was not disposed to deprive Government of the power they at present possessed. He approved of the system of keeping up skeleton regiments.

Lord Castlereagh assured the House that the state of Naples would not be the cause of adding a single man to the army nor did he think it would be consistent to reduce the army lower than the force estimated. Not longer ago than last year 600 persons were indicated for, and some convicted of, High Treason, and the consequence was, it was found necessary to strengthen the hands of the Government with an additional force of 10,000 troops. The spirit of turbulence had not long subsisted, and the question was, whether the Committee would not go too far by recommending the reduction of those troops. He denied that any further reduction could be made with safety to the country other than what his Majesty's Government had already made.

Mr. Calcraft contended that a material saving might still be made in various branches of the public service,

After some observations on the necessity of economy made by Mr. Bernal, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Barham, Mr. C. Hutchinson, &c. the House at length divided on the amendment proposed by Colonel Davies.—For the amendment, 75—Against it, 168.

The Gallery was kept closed, when the Committee, we understand, divided no less than eleven times; the two last were:

For the Chairman reporting progress, 38—Against it, 145.
On Mr. Lambton's motion for excluding fresh candles—For it, 31—Against it, 146.

The Chairman then reported progress, and the House adjourned at five o'clock.

TUESDAY.

Mr. Fynes presented a petition from the Dean and Chapter of Westminster against the Roman Catholic Bill.

Sir J. Graham presented a Petition from certain Magis trates and others, inhabitants of Carlisle, complaining of the increase of irreligion and blasphemy, which he attributed to the want of public establishments for religious education, and praying for leave to build churches at their own expence. The Petition was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Western postponed his motion for the repeal of the last

Malt Duties, until the 21st inst.

Mr. Curves postponed his motion for repealing the Husbandry Horse Tax to the 26th inst.

Mr. S. Wortley brought in a Bill for regulating the attendance of persons at Assizes, which was ordered to be read a second time this day three weeks .-- Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY. Mr. James presented a petition from a large portion of the inhabitants of Liverpool, complaining of Agricultural, Manufacturing, and Commercial Distress, arising from taxation; and as a means of averting the evils resulting from that distress they suggested that Government should enforce the payment of the loan of 20,000,000l due from Austria, which would have the object of preventing the Allied Monarchs, particularly Austria, from attacking independent nations. It was laid on the Table. Mr. Chetwynd moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to enquire into and report upon the laws relating to Vagrants, and to consider the expediency of amending the The Hon. Member noticed the increase of vagrancy, and the alarming amount of the country rates. The charge of supporting vagrants could not be taken at less than 100,0001 annually. He condemned this wandering life, and vagrants, when pressed, would commit the ta, and thus be subject to punish-ment, when they were liberated, they claimed settlements which were wrong, and were sent about from parish to parish, entailing heavy expences. He had known cases of vagrants of this description who were passed from 18 to 20 times. There were not less than 48 statutes upon this subject. The first was that of the 5th of Edward the third; the next was the 19th of Henry the 7th, and to that succeeded the 22d of Hen. 8; but the principal statute for the consideration of the Committee was passed 70 years since, in the 17th of Geo. 2. which gave rewards for the apprehension of vagrants, directions for passing them, and the right of appeal at Sessions. With respect to this statute, Chief Justice Kenyon and Mr. Justice Ashburst said it was difficult to understand it. A Committee

Mr. R. Smith meved for copies or extracts of all communications between Great Britain and the Austrian Government relating to the repayment of sums due to this Country on ac-eount of loans made to that Government in the yeart 1794 and 1797. The Hon. Gent. wished to ascertain what application had been made for the repayment of these loans, which, with interest, amounted to 17,000,0001.; and he thought the present was the most favourable time for demanding the repayment

Lord Castlereagh thought it better not to discuss the question until after the papers were produced, to which he had no objection. It would be seen, when the papers were on the Table, that many difficulties had arisen in the way of settling the accounts with Austria. - The motion was agreed to.

In a Committee of Supply, the proposed resolution for voting $1,465 men for the Land Forces of His Majesty having been read, Mr. M'Donald proposed a reduction of 10,000 men from that number. In so doing, he had no wish to fetter or embarrass the Government as to where the reduction should applywhether in the new Colonies at home, or the old ones observed, that taking artillery, veterans, militia, and volunteers, there would be a disposeable force of 200,000 men for internal necessity. He moved, that instead of $1,468, the amount be 71,468 land forces, &c. Sir H. Fivian was of opinion the army would not bear reducing, when we had so many garrisons abroad. At present there were only 48,630 men for England and Ireland. The gallant General entered into some calculations, to shew that the ermy, taking into consideration our Culonial pessessions, &c. would not admit of any reduction.

Mr. Calvert thought many of our Foreign Garrisons and Stations could be given up;—he saw no great use in keeping: Gibraltar—the same remark would apply to all our Stations in the Mediterranean. He was of opinion the Household Troops might be reduced to one half. He supported the amendment.

Mr. Hume dissented from the last speaker with respect to Gibraltar and the Islands in the Mediterranean. The Hon. Member went over the items in the various departments of the Military Establishment, and complained that the Noble Lord (Palmerston) had not attended to economy in his selection for reduction. The number of 32,000 men for the Colonies was reduction. much too large. At present we had 207,000 men in arms, which he considered too extravagant an establishment; and he which he considered too extravagant an establishment; and not thought there were too many officers for the number of men to be commanded; and, upon a review of the whole, a reduction of 20,000 men ought to take place. The Staff, which, in 1792, cost 17,1211. now was 80,0001. By reducing the amount of the army 20,000 men, a saving would be made in pay of 588,2561.—In barracks, commissariat, and extraordinaries, of 434,7591.; the expense of garrison duty might be reduced to 22,9001.; in the Military College, a saving of 15,0001. might be made; in the Asylum, 25,0001.; and on the half pay, 100,0001. He regretted, that the Duke of York should have granted so many new commissions as 1105; he wished rather, that half-pay officers had been appointed in lieu. He concluded with urging the necessity for economy and reduction.

Sir H. Harding observed, that the Finance Committee of 1817 had reported that no alteration was necessary in respect to the Guards;—there had been no alteration in the system from its first creation, 150 years ago, when it then was seven battalions. He defended the occupation of Gibraltar, as a measure of no small importance to this Country.

Mr. Goulburn defended the arrangements for keeping up a suitable force for the defence of our Colonies;—he admitted that the establishment in the Mediterrenean was large; but it must be recollected, that we had not only Gibraltar to defend, but Malta to garrison, and the Ionian Isles to defend. He maintained that the Foreign Enlistment Bill had not greatly injured the half-pay officers of this country.

Mr. J. P. Grant recommended that the resources of the Country should be properly husbanded.

Sir R, Ferguson was not inclined to wish for any particular reduction in the pay of officers or soldiers. He made some allusions to the Cavalry, and objected to the formation of the regiments of Lancers; he preferred the old English modes of fighting.

Col. Wood defended the Cavalry from the reflections cast upon them, and stated the services which these troops had rendered in the field, particularly at Waterloo.

Major Gen. Wilson contended that the alterations in the Cavalry. Regiments would render them inefficient in the field, The Colonies could, he thought, be defended by a fewer number of troops; and was of opinion, that no regiment ought to remain in the West Indies more than four years. The Veteran Battalions were better for home service than the troops of the line, and they cost two thirds less than the Regulars.

Lord Castlereagh contended, that the army would answer all purposes of defence, constituted us it at present was, but would not admit of reduction.

After some further conversation, the Committee divided-the Amendment, 115—Against it, 210—Majority, 95.

Mr. Dauson proposed to reduce the number 5000. On this proposition a division ensued,—For the Amendment, 130— Against it, 195- Majority, 65.

The original resolutions were then agreed to Adjourned.
THURSDAY.

Sir T. Lethbridge brought in a Bill to enable the Trusteet of Alms Houses, and other charitable foundations to alienate lands and hereditaments in exchange for equivalent property of a similar nature.-Read a first time-Second reading

The Bill for more effectually punishing Young Offenders, was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

A petition was brought up from Bridgenorth, against granting the claims of the Roman Catholics. The Flax Manufacturing Encouragement Bill was passed.

Mr. Croker said if Mr. Plunkett's Bill went into a Committee, he should move that it be an instruction to the Confmittee to take measures to enable His Majesty to make provision for the Roman Catholic Clergy.

Sir R. Ferguson complained of a breach of privilege, in consequence of some paragraphs of a gross nature, in which, he considered libels against his Hon. Friend (Mr. Creavey), by accusing him of cowardice in a transaction which occurred betwint him and an Hon. Bart. (Sir George Warrender). He had to observe, that if any point of honour remained unsatisfied in arranging that affair, the blame was imputable to him (Sir R.) and not to the Hon. Gent. (Mr. Creevey), a more base, false or malicious libel never was inserted in any paper than the one he now complained of, for an explanation had taken place of the most satisfactory nature. The Hon. Officer then alluded to John Bull of last Sunday; a paper which he considered a stain upon the public press of the country—a most malicious, false and rascally publication. As far as party feelings went in dictating political animadversions, God forbid a libel of that kind should be punished, but the case was altered when it was private character that was attacked—not only did shis paper attack the virtuous living, but it raked up the asies of the virtuous dead.

Lord Binning confirmed the statement of the Hon. Officer. The affair alluded to was conducted by himself and the Hon. Officer in a matter satisfactory to all parties.

And tone observations from Mr. Bernel, Mr. Wortley, &c. of Matter dropped.

Mr. James moved that the Petition of the Freemen of Car-hide, complaining of the interference of the military in the eral election which took place at Carliele on the 28th June general election which took prace at Cammittee of Privilege. outrage complained of occurred in May. A long canvers had taken place is which a souffle ensued, and one of Sir P. Musgrave's flags was torn down; application was made to the Mayor to protect Sir Philip; Dr. Lowry, a magistrate, read the Riot Act, and two companies of infantry were marched through the town, and many outrages were committed against the liberties of the subject. It was to stop evils of this description that he wished the House to interfere.

Sir P. Musgrave opposed the motion on the ground that the attageous conduct of the mob rendered the interference of the military necessary, besides the interference of the Mayor was treated with contempt, and had it not been for a storm of rain and thunder which fell at the time, the consequences from the unruly conduct of the mob night have been dreadful; the civil power was inadequate to keep the peace.

Sir J. Mackintosh supported the appointment of a Committee

Lord Castlereach observed, that, so far as Government were concerned, orders had been sent down to the Castle to withdraw the troops on the eve of election, in consequence of which the cavalry were withdrawn, and Sir J. Byng directed that the cestle should be shut up.

Lord Lowther confirmed the statement of Sir P. Musgrave. The motion was supported by Mr. Curwen, Mr. Calcraft, Mr. Wynn, and Mr. Bennett, and was at length agreed to.

Mr. Harbord moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to enquire into the laws respecting bread, in order to remedy the defects in these laws, and to punish those who adulterate or sell bread short of weight. In that respect he thought the 59th Geo. III. was deficient, as it enacted " that the soller of light bread cannot be punished unless the bread be weighed before a magistrate within twenty-four hours after being baked." A poor man could not be prepared to prove that fact; the baker ought rather to have been prepared to shew when it was taken from the oven. A Committee was appointed.

On bringing up the Report of the Army Estimates, Mr. Bernal objected to parts of the Estimates, and contended that reduction was necessary.

Sir H. Harding maintained, that to remodel the Footguards would entail an additional expense on the country.

Mr. Lockhart contended, the present system ought to be changed. He objected to the report being received, lest some additional claims should be bereafter made to supply the deficiencies in the resources of the country for maintaining the Sir H. Parnell recommended the attention of Ministers to the forces in Ireland, which required reduction.

Lord Palmerston assured the Hon. Burt. his suggestions should be attended to.

The Report was brought up.

Mr. Hume proposed an amendment, viz. to reduce the number of forces from $1,000 to 71,000. This proposition led to some conversation, in which Col. Davies, Mr. C. Hutchinson, Sir R. Ferguson, Mr. Wilberforce, and Mr. W. Smith supported the proposition, which was opposed by Mr. R. Mar-

On a division there were, for the Amendment, 46-Against

The Resolutions were then agreed to, and leave was given to bring in a Bill founded on them.

Lord Althorpe moved the second rending of the County

Courts Bill.

Mr. Lockhart agreed with the principle of the Bill, but be thought much would depend on the sum proposed to be filled up in the blank. The Court of Quarter Session would be a much more Constitutional Court, and a much cheaper mode of disposing of cases under 151. He thought that the exclusion of counsel from practising in the Court was objectionable.

Mr. F. Palmar objected to throwing the business into the Quarter Sessions.

Mr. Chetwynd was convinced that much oppression was practised in the County Courts by attorneys and others, to the great injury of the poor. The Quarter Sessions was already overbutthened with business. He was unfriendly to the emplayment of stipendiary magistrates.

The Attorney General reserved to himself the right of objecting to this Bill in a future stage, for it was a novelty in every suspect. It went to creet a great number of jurisdictions, to propose a barrister of five years standing as a judge of each, at a salary of 5001, a year. This was too small a sum; besides 5001, a year was the least sum at which gentlemen could be called upon to take office. There would be no fewer than eighty judges, and a vast number of clerks, criers, balliffs, &c. The Bill required much and serious consideration.

Lord Althorpe feared there was little chance of success for his Bill, as the Hon, and Learned Gent, seemed unfriendly to it. He admitted the business at Quarter Sessions was heavy He had excluded counsel on account of expence

The Bill was read a second time, and committed for Monday. The Irish Tythes Leasing Bill was read a second time, and committed for this day se'nnight,—Adjourned. PRIDAY.

Sir W. Scott presented a petition from the clergy of the Archdeacoury of Essex against the Bill now before the House, for the removal of the remaining Roman Catholic disabilities.

Mr. Hart Davis presented petitions from the parishes of St Peter, St. Thomas, All Saints, and St. Mary's Radeliff, Bristol, against the Roman Catholic claims.

Mr. Hume presented a petition from one Richard Hayes, who stated himself to be a Kranciscan Friar, of Wexford, in Ireland, against the enactment of the Bill for relief of Roman Catholics now before the House.

Sir T. Lethbridge presented petitions against the Roman Catholic claims from the Archdeacon and Clergy of the city of Bath, and the inhabitants of Kingshaw, both in the county of Somerset. The Hon. Member stated that his constituents were against admitting Roman Catholics to political power, but were nettated by a most liberal spirit. He concurred in the spirit of the petition.

Sir 1. Coffin had served His Majesty fifty years-had fought along with Roman Catholics all over the world, and uniformly knew them to be as prodigal of their blood as any other men in His Majesty's service.

Mr. Lockhart presented a petition from the Mayor and Corporation of Oxford, against the Catholic claims.

Sir W. Scott presented a similar petition from the Clergy of the Archdencoury of Middlesex.

Mr. Witherforce presented a petition from the Roman Catholic Clergy and Laity of the counties of Stafford and Warwick, in favour of the Roman Catholics. The petitioners as serted their loyalty to their King; their attack Throne and the Constitution, recognizing no other temporal or civil authority whatever, than His Majesty and his successors.

Sir T. Lethbridge congratulated the House on the presenta-tion of this petition, as it showed that the sentiments of the Roman Catholics were still unaftered. He hoped the attention of the House would be seriously directed to it. He would ask, could any expectation be indulged, that the Roman Catholics would be satisfied with the present Bills, when one of the greatest authorities among the Roman Catholics, Dr. Milner had subscribed the petition now before the House. His decided conviction was, that, in the event of the present Bill passing into a law, a second Bill would be introduced for the repeal of it; so little did he think it calculated to meet the enposed. He had the highest respect for the Roman Catholics; but, from a regard for them, as well as for the Protestants, he should oppose any further concession to that body. Let the House grant them what they would, still something more would

Mr. Plankett felt that the same malignant spirit was work which displayed itself with so much activity 1813, instigated, he presumed, by the same Dr. Milzer. But the sentiments of the Roman Catholics were not to be collected from the Petition now before the House. When the Noble Lord (Nugent) had presented the Petition of the English Roman Catholics, it appeared that it was signed by seven out of the eight Apostolic Vicars, and the eight was no other than Dr. Milner, upon whose opposition the Hon. Bart. (Sir T. Lethbridge) congratulated the House. He (Mr. Plunkett) held in his hand a document which would shew that Dr. Milner had represented the day on which Roman Catholic emancipation should be granted, to be the duy of the downfall of the Roman Catholic religion in England. He was not in any alarm for the downfall of this religion; he only dreaded the downfall and total annihilation of all fouds and distinctions between Roman Catholies and Protestants.

After some further conversation the Petition was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Coke presented a Petition, signed by afty of the Clergy Norwich, in support of the Catholic Claims.

Mr. Wedchouse was auxious to say a few words, as he had had the honour of presenting to the House a Petition, signed by 220 clergymen, against the Catholic Claims. He regretted that the word bigotry had been used on either side, and be that the discussion should be carried on in the same spirit of liberality with which it had commenced.

The Petition was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Lord Palmerston presented a Petition from the University of Cambridge against any further concessions to the Roman Catholics. The petition stated, that the opinions of the Roman Catholics were still unaltered, and that their permission to political power would be attended with the most dangerous sequences. Mr. Plunkett moved the order of the day for the second reading of the Bill for revising the disabilities under which Catholics labour. He stated that the Bill had diffused general satisfaction among his fellow countrymen, and he was sorry to say that there were some persons who looked upon their fellow Roman Catholic subjects with undiminished hostility, and wished to bequeath that hostility as a heir loom from sire to son for ever. He deprecated the idea of having applied the epithet bigot to any of the opposers of the Bill, he treated the opinions of such persons with respect, and was aware that he was liable The Hon. Gent. contended, that no real danger would accrue from granting their claims. The Roman Ca-tholics complained that, by certain Acts of Charles II. they were excluded from certain offices in the State. Do they deny validity of those Acts? No; but they said That the had arisen out of temporary circumstances—that a danger existed to which a remedy was applied, but that now the danger was gone, the remedy was no longer necessary. They now therefore asked it as a matter of justice from the House that the restrictions which were imposed upon them by the exigency of the times, should cease, the exigency no longer existing. The danger having censed, so ought the restrictions to be re moved. He then proceeded to state the nature of the Bill, which contained two distinct objects :- First, the disqualifying, by reason of the outh of Supremacy; and, secondly, the dis qualification, by reason of the declaration of the doctrine of transubstantiation. No man, he believed, had ever contended for the propriety of that declaration; it was justly considered injurious to the best interests of Christianity, and incapable of affording any real benefit or security. A man may subscribe to it, and yet continue a Papist, and therefore, it was not that security the House ought to have. He was justified in saying that the laws excluding the See of Rome from interfering with English affairs, were previous to the Reformation. He re-ferred to the words of exception in the Act of Phillip and Mary, to prove his position. The Act of Elizabeth expounded the bath required by the preceding Acts. The Hon, Gent, then described the emecting parts of the Bill, which required that every person desirous of taking the eath, should go before the proper officer of the Court of Justice in England, Iroland, or scotland; and in open Court subscribe the existing ouths, the officer being required by him to read the explanation at the time. He next adverted to the clauses of exception; the principal of which went to disable a Roman Catholic, from hold-ing the office of Lord High Chancellor, Lord Commissioner, or other great office, mentioned in the Act. The next related to the intercourse of English subjects with the See of Rome. On this head, he should previde on oath, declaring, that the person who took the oath, denied all right in any Foreign Power to overthrow or endanger the policy of the Church of England. It should go on to provide for the appointment of Bishops of the Crown. With respect to Bishops, he should himself (dif-fering very little from the Bish of 1613, providing that the oath should be taken before the appeintment,) have preferred a domestic nomination, but on inquiry, he found, that Roman Catholics had no settled principle of nomination. With respect to the securities, they would form the ground-work of another Bill—concession forming one Bill, and security the other. He concluded with moving the second reading.

Sir W. Scott thought the Right Hon. Gent. had proposed some material alterations, and it was due to the House to give them time for consideration.

Mr. Bankes was not disposed to restrict the right of every man to follow the dictates of his conscience in the worship of his Creator, and was therefore destrous of speaking in terms of moderation of every sect. But in the discharge of his duty as a Member of Perlinment, he must speak firmly and freely; and his opinion was that the Cathelic, if sincere, must heartily wish—and in case of an opportunity, would do all in his power to accomplish, the destruction of the Protestant Religion in this country—a wish which he believed this Bill would give them the power of executing. Under these circumstances, was it angural that the Roman Catholich should not be jeulous of the ascendancy of the Pretentants, and that they should not feel every disposition to make use of the means in their power to pat an end to that escendancy.

Me. Wilberforce admitted, that nothing could be more equitable, or of more political expediency than to give all the subjects of the United Kingdom an eligibility to all the franchises of the State, without any exception of Sect or pasty. Nothing could so much strengthen, nothing could so much harmonize with the British Constitution. With respect to Ireland, her interest was more involved in that question, than the interests of Great British. It was not until the reign of George the Third, that Ireland found any respite from the odious and unmanly system of oppression practised towards her by England. The reign of George the Third became a glorious and a memorable epoch in the history of Ireland. It was then she found some little relaxation from the grievous and intolerable persecution carried on against The measure of the Union held out such hopes to the Catholics of Ireland. The great statesman who effected that measure had not clearly and distinctly expressed himself on that measure ned not descriy and distinctly expressed immeet to sent subject. The epigrammatic point of his words recalled them at that distant period to his (Mr. Wilberforce's) memory. They were somewhat enigmatical and ambiguous. "As England and Ireland," said Mr. Pitt, "would be united into one body, the rights of the Catholics might be secured with more safety, or refused with less danger." The Hon. Gent. asked on what pretence Catholics could be any longer deprived of their due rank and station in the legal professions? No good reason could be offered for such disability, and the Roman Catholic Barrister would most naturally seek to recover that mak and that power which he was excluded from by unreasonable apprehensions and unmeaning jealousies. The exclusion of Roman Catho-lics from a seat in that House rested on no better foundation. If a Catholic gentleman of rank and property and education had imbibed any hontile designs, or entertained had feelings of any kind, let him at once be introduced into that House. In that House would Roman Catholics have an opportunity of correcting their errors, and profiting by the illustrious examples which it would be in their power dally to behold.

Mr. Bathwet contended that there would be danger in granting the concessions. He thought that the Catholics would not be satisfied with any concessions short of a total and unqualified rapeal of all the laws affecting that body. The question there-fore was if it were not better to stop where they were, than proceed a step further.

Mr. Metcalf thought it would be unwise to grant any more

Str J. Mackintosh could conceive no situation in any country more dangerous than that of an army being kept on fort, of which the highest officers could not hold even the lowest civil office. This would be a worse situation than that which existed in the time of James II, for when that Monarch proposed to have Roman Catholic officers at the head of the army, he left the Parliament open to them. But now according to the new law, the whole military force of the kingdom might be hands of men, who could have no share in the civil Govern-ment, and who by law were forced to be enemies to the Con-

Mr. Peel could not help contrasting the situation in which he stood, with that in which his opposeous were placed. His was the unpopular side; he exposed himself to be broaded as the champion of filiberality,—perhaps, too, he was dishear-tened at the prospect of an unsuccessful opposition, whilst gentlemen on the other side were cheered by the prospect before them, and in every respect possessed advantages over him. All he asked was a toleration of opinion. The Rt. Mon. Gent. could find no era in which Catholics were not excluded from Civil power in Protestant states. He proceeded to show the consequences of admitting Catholics to a seat in Parlia-From Ireland 100 members were sent to that House, Of these 64 were returned for the counties; there were about 16 close boroughs, and the remaining 20 were for large towns, It would from this be seen that there were 84 Members returned for places where the elective franchise was very general. It followed that 84 Members would be returned in where 4-5ths of the voters were Roman Catholics. persons were considerably under the influence of the Priest; concomitant with this influence was that of the landlosd; and this he showed to operate very materially on the population of Ireland. The Bill now before the House contained regulations which were thought necessary for the security of the Protestant religion, but these, if the Bill passed, he did not think would remain in force five years. He did not expect that the Catholic Members, when they got into that House, would at once move for the subversion of the Protestant Establishment, but he believed they would move for the repeal of these regulations. For such purposes they, as Catholics, might fairly unite, and he expected they would naturally be led to combine against the interests of the Protestant Church in England.

Mr. Canning rose, under feelings of greater anxiety than he ever before experienced, from the great and growing expediency of the measure and other oircumstances. Amongst the many facilities that offered for conciliating our Catholic countrymen, a new reign and an untried Parliament were brilliant circumstances. The magnitude of the issue filled him with more borror than the difficulty of the discussion. It was most true, as stated by the Hon. Member for Bramber (Mr. Wilberforce), that it was not the laws themselves which formed the grievance—it was the imputation which they conveyed—giving poignancy to the feelings of the Roman Catholics. For two-centuries those laws had been growing—for helf a century they had been declining. The space on the summit of the mount was only twenty years—two centuries had contributed to their perfection. The argument against the question now was as if the Spiritual connection with a fereign state was the only one. On the contrary a comexion of a tetally sifferent nature formed the ground of the enactment of the Penal Laws. The Hon, Gentleman here entered into an history of the Penal Laws and a recapitulation of their enactments; concluded it by arguing, that if the danger had ceased which called for them, or that no danger had ever existed, it was full time to revoke them.—Suppose a murder was said to have time to revoke them.—Suppose a morder was said to have been committed by a person wearing a wig and spectacles, still, if it eppeared no murder had been committed, was every man wearing a wig and spectacles to be punished. The Rt. Hon. Gentleman took smother review of the Pennik Laws from the reign of Elizabeth to the present. He asked, were thay Roman Catholics who brought Charles the First to the block? He then alluded to a Bill having been sent up from the House of Commons to the House of Lords, in forty-one, for excluding the Bishops from seats in Parliament. The Bill was rejected in the Lords by a small majority, and in that majority every one of the Catholic Peers had voted. In a few years after, those very Bishops voted for the exclusion of the Roman Catholics from Parliament. He trusted, as one good turn deserved another, that the passing of the Bills then below the House, would afford the present Bishops an opportunity to pay the debt. He contended that, from the moment of the passing of the Repeal Laws is 1793, the conviction on every man's mind was, that a total repeal should follow. What! give the power to elect, and withhold the eligibility to be elected? We had bridged the Channel, and brought the Irish amengst us; and having done so, were we to stop now? For two centuries we had been erecting a mound—wrought it high;—

throwned upon the waters to prevent their approach.— Were we now to fortify that mound, or leave it to moulder away by accident? Or should we cut the Ishmus, and float on the mighty wave, the ark of our combined Constitution.— The Right Hon. Gentleman, here combated the arguments that had been used against the Bills; admitted that the Roman Catholics should be excluded from the Chancellorship, and from the Universities; ridiculed the idea of any danger to the State, by the possible election of Roman Catholic demagogues to seats in that House. He never knew a demagogue come there, who did not in six months find his level; and he wished, that in any plan for Parliamentary Reform, which might be adopted, a little nest of boroughs should be left for them, and their only qualification should be a speech in New Palace-yard. The Hon. Gent. then bore testimony to the lovelly and specificant rule by the Catholics and considered. loyalty and sacrifices made by the Catholics, and concluded a most eloquent and brilliant speech, of which, we regret to say, the want of space prevents our being able to give more than a

As soon as the Right Hon. Gent. had concluded, there were loud cries of "Question" from both sides of the House, and strangers being ordered to withdraw, a division took place, when the numbers were.—For the original Motion, 254—for the Amendment, 243-Majority in favour of the Roman Ca-

ADVERTISEMENT .- Such is the World .- " The principal part of the characters, whom the Author has introduced in this popular Novel, are of the higher circles, but sufficiently diversified exteriorly and intrinsically in their actions and language to furnish amusement to those who have, no doubt, perused the originals. It is impossible in a brief notice, to enter into the story, which, though a tale of mystery, owing to the wickedness of a chief character in the drama, offers to the reader all the interest that can attend circumstances arising one out of another from the beginning to the end of the plot. This constant succession of scenery, of situations in which fortune places the heroine of the tale, the varied beings she comes in contact with, and an endless train of spirited dialogue, make "Such is the World," an interesting novel. As regards the plot, it is artfully contrived; the unravelling is easy, the event natural, but striking and unexpected. At one moment the heart is melted into tenderness by misfortune, which the sufferers could neither foresee nor prevent; at another all the finer feelings are excited, by the encouragement and reward of virtue;—uniformly the actors bear about them the stamp of human nature; they have their precious, their weakpresses, and the reference of have their passions, their weaknesses, and the raiseries of mortals;—the style is chaste, the narrative partakes of a polished species of easy composition which distinguishes the sest novelists of our Island; the moral is obvious and instructive; and the dialogue maintained throughout sparkles with a brilliancy which reminds us of a highly finished Comedy rather than a Novel."

There has been a considera ble deal of business transacted during the week, but during the former part there was very little fluctuation; on Friday, however, three expresses, arriand in town from Paris, where intelligence had been communicated by a telegraphic dispatch of the Pledmontess army to the amount of seventy thousand men having joined the Neapolitans in their defence against the Allied Powers; this circumstance had a visible effect on the French Audos as soom as it was made known in Paris, and a depreciation of nearly one par sent, was the consequence; the effect was also 5900 perceived on our own counts, as a denime of a half per cent. took place. During Friday a great many bargains were transacted at the decline occasioned by the above circumstance, but a reaction took place, and they left off at somewhat steadier prices; yesterday, however, a French mail arrived, as also another express from Parls, quoting the French Funds as low as 61.60; it was followed by a decline in our own Funds. Consols opened at 723 for money, and 723 for the account, but upon the arrival of the express they rapidly declined, and did not recover their former prices during the day.

JOHN BULL.

LONDON, MARCH 18.

HAVING expressed our feelings and wishes upon the question of the Catholic Claims, we have been the more anxious to give the debate of Friday night, as fully and impartially as possible; in doing this, we have left ourselves no room for remarks upon the debate. This must also excuse us to many of our correspondents, whose favours would otherwise have appeared to day.

IT is at this period of our labours, cheering to look back at the Queen's progressive descent, seeing how duly it kept pace with our prognostications.

On the 4th of February, and on the occasion of her defeat in the House of Commons, we called her the oor Queen, when after the question of the Liturgy had been disposed of, the analyty of 50,000l. per annum was offered to her, and when not one of those who before had so loudly proclaimed her virtue could be found to move for a sum, which, had she not been degraded, she ought to have received.

This, however, was in some degree qualified by the high tone of the Message, (as her Majesty called it,) which Brougham brought down, in which she declares " she feels it due to the House and herself, respectfully to declare, that she perseveres in the resolution of declining any arrangement while her name continues to be excluded from the Litungy."

Upon this occasion, be it remarked, that Mr. Tierney made this observation:—"The Noble Lord (Castlereagh) might use as many high-sounding phrases as he pleased, but the Queen's namewould be restored to the Liturgy, nevertheless. Let the Noble Lord believe him, he would stake all his credit on the event."—Let this not be forgotten.

On the 18th of February, our remarks upon the subject began thus:-

"The poor Queen," so we called her a fortnight ago;
"last week rendered her still poorer than the affairs of the past week entitle her to the epithet of poorest: and if matters go on at the same rate for a few days longer, we shall be at a loss for words to represent her forlorn condition.

This was upon the occasion of Mr. Smith's motion for restoring her name to the Liturgy. When her minority was reduced from two hundred and nine, to that often-tried and memorable number, one hundred and seventy-eight. This was the day, on which we had also to record the division upon Lord Archibald Hamilton's motion, for the restoration of her name to the Prayers of Scotland; and when her former minority of one hundred and seventy-eight dropped at a blow tothirty-five .

At this period, however, she was still consistent— the Times still lavish in her praise—mobs still throng-ing her balls, and some still swearing by her injured innocence.

It was then we "ventured to prophecy, that she would, in a short time, forfeit her pledge not to receive any public money, eat her words, take ber annuity, and abandon an odious climate, which, as she emphatically says, is as fickle as its people."

We only ask our readers how much of our prophecy is left unfulfilled?—We really seek, as we said we should, for words to express our sense of the Queen's situation. She has forfeited her pledge—she has eaten her words her name is not restored to the Liturgy-and she has taken the money.

Mark the effect which this exhibition of her character has had.-Not one syllable has appeared in her own journal relating to her, for a whole week-for the same period has the Chronicle been also hushed—Brauden-burgh is deserted—Brougham is in Westmereland— Madocks has declined his Vice-Chamberlainship—and Tierney has withdrawn himself from public life.—And thus end the hopes of a desperate faction, and the pretensions of an abandoned woman.

IF we are to believe the Reporters, Sir Ronald Fergusson is very angry with JOHN BULL: this, in a political point of view, neither surprises nor moves us, except with a pleasurable feeling; but we must take leave to express our astonishment at the observations, which the reporters have put into the General's mouth, as to the conduct of this paper.

The General is made to say, that we " rake up the ashes of the virtnous dead."

That this remark alludes to the case of the late Lady Caroline Wrottesly is evident. We have a cause pending in the tribunals of our country upon this subject, and we should think it the height of indelicacy and insolence to offer one syllable of remark upon the matter, which might be read by those who are hereafter to form our jury, little less does it become Sir Ronald Pergusson, unauthorized as he is by any tie of blood or affection to the person in question, to take the part he is represented to have taken against us. All we can say, or will say upon that subject, is, that we did not know enough of Lord Tankerville's family to know that Lady Caroline was dead; if we had, we certainly should not have mentioned her name, but have illustrated our case with the names of living persons, which would have answered the purpose as well: but as to the system of prejudging causes which are in their proper course before the Courts, we protest against it; and this protest limit our remarks on this part of the aubiect.

With respect to the charge of attack upon private character, we deny it:—we never have mentioned the name of any individual woman who has not previously been held up by the TIMES or CHRONICLE as a com-purgator for the Queen's character, and lugged forward in print as a visitor at Brandenburgh House, or the Mansion House, or some other place where she was to be the test of, and the voucher for her Majesty's innocence.

Sir Ronald Fergusson ought to have felt, that if it had been our habit to consider political hostility as a justification for attacks of the nature he hints at, that there is a name in the Queen's list, which would have afforded us plenty of opportunity for little histories, and anecdotes, and jokes, and scandal; but while the Times and Chronicle omitted certain distinguishing marks to that name; we, with a gentlemanly feeling (which Sir Ronald should have given us credit for,) disdained to rip away the voil prudence had thrown over the visit, and gave the lady the full benefit of the obscurity in which a name so vulgar and common-place as her's had fortunately left her.

BROUGHAMIANA.—(No. V.)

Mr. Henry Brougham is requested to answer the following questions:

I. Did you, or did you not, in one of your speeches to the Freeholders of Westmoreland, in order to recommend yourself to their kindly notice, call yourself a native of that county?

II. Did you not, in a speech delivered in Cumberland, in favor of the radical Whig candidate, call yourself a native of that county?

III. Did you not, in a speech to the Freemen of Carlisle, when you appeared in support of Mr. James, drop a hint that you were a native of that city?

1V. Were you not born in Scotland?

Waiting the reply to these simple queries, we shall give a place in the Broughamiana of this week to a correspondence which took place in the year 1812, between Henry Brougham and R. M'Kerrell, Esq. a London merchant it is highly illustrative of character, and ought not to be forgotten.

"TO HENRY BROUGHAM, Eso. M. P.
"No. 7, Watting-street. June 17, 1812.
"Sir,—I have this morning rend, with the utmost astonishment, in The Times newspaper, a Report of your Speech in the House last night, wherein are the following words:— That a witness, whose name he would not mention, but a part of whose evidence had been expunged, which he was now sorry for, had declared, that when the labouring people in the manufactories had good wages, they had three times more than enough; that out-meal and water was good enough for Englishmen; and that if they were better fed, they would become pampered with luxury, and the frame of society would be unhinged.'

"Now, Sir, as I can be at no loss to understand that I am the individual alluded to, I deem it an act of duty I owe to myself to enquire, and I trust that you, Sir, will feel it to be an act of justice to inform me, in what degree the above quotation differs from your speech, in order that I may be enabled to judge of the measures proper for me to take, to repel ASSER-TIONS SO PALSE and CALUMNIOUS.

"Although, to my great regret, it was thought advisable not to le: some part of my evidence appear on the journals, you must recollect, Sir, that so far from my saying that outmeal and water was good enough for Englishmen, the words out-meal and water were never made use of during my examination; and as to my having used the other expression, that if the poor were better fed, they would become pampered with luxury, and the frame of society would be unbinged, which you are stated to have said, was heard by Mr. Rose and Mr. Stephen with horror and disgust;—if it be possible, Sir, that in the warmth of utterance you can have by accident, so misstated my words and sentiments, I trust I may rely on your candour, that you will remove any impression these words may have created, by declaring in your place, when you next appear there, (as I must now declare), that no such expression was ever uttered by me, or even entered my mind. I request the favour of your early reply, and, I am, Sir,
(Signed) "R. M'KERRELL."

"ROBERT M'RERRELL, Esq. "Temple, Wednesday. "Sim,—I have received your letter of this date, and I have to inform you in reply, that I am not answerable to any person for any thing that I deem it my duty to state in the House of Comnons, much less for words stated in reports of debate to have been spoken by me. I expressed myself last night as I felt, and as I considered it to be my duty to do respecting part of the evidence given at the bar. I was not the only person who entertained those feelings upon the subject—I believe they were universally felt. The name I thought fit both then and this day to concent, because the Committee had expunged the evidence.

"You will take what steps you please in this matter; but you can scarely expect me to give you a statement of what I said, or to correct any statement of my speech which may have appeared in the newspapers.—I am, Sir, your obedient humble servant, (Signed) "HENRY BROUGHAM,"

"H. BROUGHAM, Bag. M. P.
"Watting-street, June 26.
"Sir,—I received your letter of the 17th, wherein you inform me, in reply to my letter of that day, that in the debate wherein you had mentioned my evidence, you expressed yourself as you felt, and as you considered it your duty to do; and that you were not the only person who entertained those feelthat you were not the only person who entertained those feelings upon the subject,—that you believe they were universally

"As in this letter you refused me the justice I expected, and as I have it now from the authority of Honourable Members that the offensive part of your speech is correctly reported in The Times, I must declare to you, Sir, that if you alluded to the evidence which I gave before the Committee of the House, which was not allowed to stand on the minutes, you have asserted what you know is talse and calumnious. That part of my evidence which was expunded is still in the book of the short hand writer, and the expressions which you charged me with having uttered, that when the labouring people in the manufactories had good wages, they had three times more than enough; that out-men! and water were good enough for Englishmen, and that if they were better fed, they would became pampered with luxury, formed no part of that evidence; nor could they, for they nover were uttered by me, nor ever entered my mind.

"I have further, Sir, to inform you, that having applied to several Members of the Committee, who were present when the evidence was given, I have their authority for saying, that although from personal motives of regard for me, it was desired that the evidence should not be printed, from an appresired that the eventure stoods not be printed, from an appre-hension that feelings, inimical to me might be excited in the minds of the class of people of whom I was involuntarily called upon to speak, these Honourable Gentlemen felt nei-ther horror nor diagust; and up to the present moment I have not been able to ascertain, that such feelings have been pro-fessed by any Member of the Committee but yourself.

"Sir I am perfectly sensible that you are not answershle to
